Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not want to take very much time, and what I say is somewhat supplemental to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has said. But at the same time, I do not want to offer any apology for taking a little of the time of the Senate in presenting the case of the American farmer on this subject.

I read an article in an Ohio paper a few days ago stating that Senators Pomerene and Kenyon would introduce their bill "to abolish hog cholera in the United States Senate on next Thursday." I never knew just what was the matter I never knew just what was the matter with the Senate; the paper, I judge, is wrong.

The Washington Times had an editorial on this subject that is very good. I wish to make it a part of my remarks, and am going to ask to have it read by the Secretary at the desk. It states the whole thing, I think, in a nutshell, although the figures as to the appropriation are wrong.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair) Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Washington Times, Jan. 17, 1914.] JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE.

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE.

Out in Ohio they are starting a sort of national campaign for the extinction of hog cholera, and they want the cooperation of Congress and the State legislatures. Of course, there will never be so much appeal to the imagination in such a commonplace proceeding as there would in something less specific or practical; but it would be a fine thing if some such simple, common-sense things could be taken up and put into execution.

We are worrying about the increasing cost decreasing supplies of meat. No wonder. Hog cholera alone takes enough meat every year to account for the whole annual discrepancy. But that is not all it does. It is not even the worst it does.

The farmer who raised a drove of hogs right up close to the finishing and marketing point, putting his year's corn crop into them, and who then, late in the fall, when he has plans matured for spending the money they are going to bring in, sees them die on his hands, is losing something more than that drove of hogs.

He loses confidence in the hog-raising industry.

It takes more persistence and pertinactivy than most men possess to turn right around after a calamity like that and raise another drove of hogs. The man who suffers from the visitation of cholera is very likely not to have left even the basis on which to begin producing a new herd; he is pretty certain, in any case, not to retain much enthusiasm about doing it.

Therefore it is common experience that the farmer who this year loses 50 hogs will probably in the next two or three years produce 200 fewer hogs than he would but for this present loss. That is to say, if hog cholera takes $100,000,000 worth of hogs a year, as some of the statisticians say, it prevents the raising of two or three times that much more. And that means the difference between adequate and inadequate meat supplies for the country.

The fact is that if hog cholera could be abolished by an executive decree, the United States would in two years be restored to its old place as the greatest meat-exporting country in the world. To-day our exports are practically wiped out.

Senator Kenyox some time ago introduced a bill to appropriate $5,000,000 for the conduct of the Agricultural Department's campaign to eradicate hog cholera. It should be understood that eradication is no chimera. Remedies have been developed, methods devised, that in time, backed by enough money and authority would well-nigh exterminate the germs of the disease. But there can be no general results without those two things—money and rigorous authority.

Probably the world has got wise and liberal enough by this time to assure that such a measure as this would not be defeated with the sneering suggestion that it was "giving the farmer a few more millions." It is not more than nominally a service to the farmer. The farmer can do a lot of other things aside from raising hogs. Just at present, with corn worth around 70 cents, it is hard enough to keep the farmer convinced that it is worth while to turn the corn into meat. It takes a good deal less work and risk to haul the corn to town and sell it. What the country needs is means to keep the farmer in the mind of raising bogs, and the thing that would encourage him more than anything else would be the assurance that his chance of loss by cholera was going to be reduced year by year.

An appropriation for the stamping out of cholera would be an appropriation to do the most practical work possible in the direction of increasing the national meat supply.

Mr. KENYON. I think possibly that that editorial states the interesting heteretes they are the proper interested in

Mr. KENYON. I think possibly that that editorial states the situation better than I can, but I am so intensely interested in this question and it so affects my State that I wish to present a few facts in relation to it.

The question of the high cost of living is one that is interesting everybody and to which the people are giving a very deep study. While it may not seem to comport with the dignity of this body to discuss hog cholera, yet the losses from hog cholera have been so appalling in this country that it has become a subject which must attract the attention of the National Congress. It has gone beyond all State lines and becomes a national problem, and it is an important problem to the great industry of agriculture, which produced last year farm products exceeding $6,000,000,000 in value.

This proposition also is a great economic proposition. It goes to the question of the cost of living. It goes to the question of something to eat for the people, and that is just as important as any Alaskan railway or any Mexican question or any tariff or currency question.

As suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Pomerene], I do not believe that Members of Congress appreciate what a tremendous loss there has been in this country due to hog cholera. We have a great interest in the farmers of this country, especially at election times, but if we have that devoted interest to the farmer we have a chance in helping him now to show what that interest really is.

Prof. Kennedy, of the agricultural college at Ames, in my State, made a statement relating to the loss of hogs from cholera during the year 1912 which is rather astounding.

The national hog-cholera loss last year was 900,000,000 or 1,000,000,000 pounds of meat. This was 10 pounds per capita. Iowa's loss was 150,000,000 pounds, or 62 pounds per person, and was more this year.

He further stated that-

Iowa's loss this year would be $20,000,000. * * * It is a great feature in the high cost of living, and I am for liberal Federal aid in the elimination of hog cholera.

On yesterday I received a letter from Prof. Kennedy in which he placed the loss for the year 1913 as rather high. He says he sent out letters to every bank cashier in towns of 10,000, and in relation to it he received 1,120 replies.

By actual count-

He says-

Dallas County-

One of the counties in our State-this year lost about 20,000 head, or about 16\(\frac{2}{3}\) per cent. The data which we gathered would indicate about 17 per cent loss, so you can see that our reports are fairly accurate. I think it is putting it very low to say that the farmers of Iowa, during 1913, lost at least $30,000,000 through hog cholera.

I think that is too high, but he estimates three sources of

One is the direct loss from the hogs which die-

Which in this country would amount to 10 pounds of meat for every man, woman, and child-

Second, the direct loss from the marketing of pigs in a half-fat condition, thus sold at a sacrifice; third, the indirect loss to the cattle feeder, who loses a considerable amount of his feed by not having the hogs to follow his cattle.

I am going to discuss that in a moment as one of the matters entering vitally into the cause of the high cost of living, shall ask permission to make this letter a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

AMES, IOWA, January 19, 1914.

Senator W. S. KENYON, Washington, D. C.

Senator W. S. Kenyon, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Kenyon: Under separate cover I am sending you a hog-cholera report for the year 1913. This data was collected by the agricultural extension department in order that we might ascertain so far as possible the loss from hog cholera during the year 1913, also to have a comparison of 1913 with 1912. In order to get this data I sent out letters to every bank cashier in towns of 10,000 and under, asking them three questions: First, what was the percentage of hogs which died from hog cholera in their vicinity during the year 1913; second, what percentage of the hogs were marketed early—say, weighing between 50 and 150 pounds—due to the hog-cholera scare; third, how the loss compared with that of 1912.

We have received 1,120 replies, representing every county in Iowa. I have the data tabulated in the report which I am sending you. I believe that the number of hogs stated in the different counties is too low. For instance, in Dallas County the report shows 93,852 head. A farm-to-farm canvass made by our department for the United States Department of Agriculture in connection with this hog-cholera work there this year showed that there were 120,000 head of hogs in Dallas County. By actual count Dallas County this year lost about 20,000 head, or about 16\(^2\) per cent. The data which we gathered would indicate about 17 per cent loss, so you can see that our reports are fairly accurate. I think it is putting it very low to say that the farmers of lowa during 1913 lost at least $30,000,000 through hog cholera.

There are three sources of loss. One is the direct loss from the hogs which die: second, the direct loss from the marketing of pigs in a half-fat condition, thus sold at a sacrifice; third, the indirect loss to the cattle feeder who loses a considerable amount of his feed by not having the hogs to follow his cattle.

I assure you that this is an important subject in Iowa. In my judgment you can do our people a great deal of good by having a law passed demanding F

Mr. KENYON. In going over the records of hog losses in this country, and after consultation with the Bureau of Animal Industry on the subject, I learn that practically 90 per cent of all losses of swine that occur each year are due to a disease known as "hog cholera," and if this be the case, as it undoubtedly is, the loss is appalling, and it is certainly time for doubtedly is, the loss is apparing, and it is contained us to provide some means for the eradication of the disease, if such a thing is possible. I do not know just what is best. We can only judge of that by the experts of the Agricultural Department and the farmers, but I am in favor of a large appropriation being placed at the disposal of the Department of Agriculture for them to use in such way as they deem fit.

We have placed $40,000,000 practically in the hands of the President of the United States to build railroads in Alaska. This proposition is far more important than any railroad in Alaska, and the losses of one year, if saved, would build three times the amount of railroad we are going to construct in

Alaska

So we can likewise have confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture to use this money wisely and to accomplish the purposes intended

Hog cholera made its first appearance in this country in the State of Ohio, brought in by the importation from some for-eign countries of blooded stock, and as Ohio has that unpleasant distinction, it now has the better distinction of being the State that has appropriated more to help solve this problem than any other State in the Union, having appropriated $100,000 for a serum plant—more money than the Government has appropriated in the last 10 years on this question.

This disease has gradually extended throughout the country until now there is scarcely a State in the Union free from its ravages. Transportation lines have unwittingly and unknowingly helped to carry this disease by the fact that cars were not properly cleaned and fumigated. If no method is found to check this disease the farmers will cease to raise hogs, as a farmer will not run the risk of having the herd which represents his time and represents his crop absolutely wiped away in a week or ten days by this scourge. If the farmer does that, the cost of living is going up to a point where even our Democratic friends can not explain it.

I have prepared a map showing the losses in the various States from hog cholera in the year 1912. It shows the money expended by the various States in fighting the disease, the number of swine raised in those various States, and the recom-mendation of those various States as to the governmental ap-propriation. I want to call the attention of the Senate to just a few of the statements. This is not a northern matter entirely.

I have had letters from experts from the State of Georgia that the question is becoming a live one in the State of Georgia. During the year 1913 the State of Georgia lost 165 out of every thousand hogs. In the year previous the loss was 90 out of every thousand. So the loss in Georgia in one year's time increased nearly 100 per cent.

In the State of Florida in 1913 the loss was 170 out of every thousand. The previous year the loss was 100 out of every thousand, an increase of 70 per cent in the State of Florida. In the State of Alabama in 1913 the loss was 110 out of every thousand. In the previous year the loss was 65 out of every thousand, showing an increase of nearly 100 per cent in the State of Alabama.

In the State of Louisiana in 1913 the loss was 110 out of every thousand. In the previous year it was 100.

In the State of Arkansas in 1913 the loss was 160 out of every thousand. In the previous year 140.

Mississippi lost 154 out of every thousand in 1913. In the previous year in Mississippi the loss was 75 to a thousand, an increase in loss of over 100 per cent.

Taking the States of the Far West as indicated on the

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Senator the statistics for North Carolina?

Mr. KENYON. I have the statistics here for North Carolina. For the year ending January 1, 1913, North Carolina lost 69,687 hogs, to the value of $536,589. Colorado in 1913 lost 100 out of each thousand. The loss of the previous year in Colorado was 20 out of each thousand, being an increase of 500 per cent in the State of Colorado.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. BRADY. Has the Senator any information as to the loss in 1913?

Mr. KENYON. I have it for my own State and I have statistics as to the year ending March 31, 1913. I have no figures later than that.

Mr. BRADY. I notice that the loss to Idaho in 1912, according to the figures on the map, was something over 7,000. The loss probably was several times as great the past year.

Mr. KENYON. I am satisfied that is true.

Mr. BRADY. I wondered whether the Senator has the exact

Mr. KENYON. I have not, but judging from the increase in our own State the loss in Idaho must have increased that much.

The State of Indiana in 1912 lost 150 out of each thousand; Illinois, 140 out of each thousand; Nebraska, 110: Kansas, 120; Missouri, 175 out of each thousand, nearly one-fifth of all the swine within the borders of that State. The loss in Missouri has been more in proportion, slightly so, to the number of swine than in any other State for the year 1912, but the Government is making experiments now in Missouri, Indiana, and Iowa. Iowa lost 160 out of each thousand. The previous year the loss was 80, which showed an increase of 100 per cent.

I desire to have inserted in the RECORD this statement of the condition of hogs April 1, and the estimated loss during the year ending March 31, 1913, from which I have just read. is the latest, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, I have. These figures were obtained from the crop reports for 1913, and I wish to make them a part of my remarks

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KENYON. Those who have examined the map will notice that the great losses have been in what are known as the corn-producing States. Iowa has more hogs than any State in the Union-double the amount. Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, and Ohio have been the chief losers, though Kansas has also been a very heavy loser.

I wish to quote from the report of the committee of the United States Live Stock Sanitary Association on hog-cholera legislation. This report was submitted to the association December 2, 1913, and I read as follows:

cember 2, 1913, and I read as follows:

In studying the conditions that existed in previous decades, and covering a period of about 40 years, the committee finds that the losses from hog cholera have very probably averaged over $50,000,000 annually during these decades.

In 1897 Dr. D. E. Salmon, then Chief of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry, states in the annual report of that bureau: "The losses (from hog cholera) have, however, been tremendous, being placed by some as high as $100,000,000 a year, an estimate which does not appear exagerated in the light of the careful inquiries in the State of Iowa, from which it was concluded that this one State lost from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 worth of swine in a single year."

FINANCIAL LOSS TREMENDOUS.

Since this loss is a regular annual occurrence, its meaning can best

Since this loss is a regular annual occurrence, its meaning can best be brought to us by looking upon it as the lost interest on a permanent investment. It would require an investment of $1,250,000,000, at 4 per cent, to yield $50,000,000, and since this loss has been going on for at least 40 years, the total loss has already exceeded $2,000,000,000, or, with compound interest, to more than twice the hypothetical investment of $1,250,000,000 referred to. Measured in the value of the finished product (pork), these figures would practically be doubled.

The money involved in these losses would build a transcontinental railroad—

This is a report of this committee-at $10,000 a mile, through the United States every year, or it would support, on a million-dollar-a-year-income basis, a great university and agricultural experiment station for each State in the Union, and haif a dozen extra universities for such States as need them.

With these figures before us—

Says this report-and the problem of the high cost of living staring us constantly in the face, how many questions are of greater economic importance than that of the control of hog cholera for the prevention of these enormous losses?

Now, mind you, the statement of Dr. D. E. Salmon, dates back to the year 1897, and this great loss has been going on ever since that time, and I am credibly informed that the loss in Iowa for the year 1913 will be something like $20,000,000, and that our neighboring State of Missouri will suffer a loss of something like $10,000,000 for the same year.

I have heretofore stated that Prof. Kennedy estimated the loss in our State for 1913 at $30,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. What date was that? Mr. KENYON. This report is December 2, 1913.

Mr. WARREN. How far back does it go? Mr. KENYON. It goes back some years.

Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, are also great sufferers, but, as is shown by the map, the balance of the States of the Union have also suffered very materially. It is safe to assume that the losses from hog cholera during the year 1913 have been close to agricultural classes, but into the serious problem of the cost of living, that Congress would be willing to do everything in its power to help eradicate this disease. There should be cooperation between the States and the Federal Government. I want to put into the Record the figures showing the amount of money expended by the United States Department of Agriculture in the study of hog-cholera cures and also the amounts that have been expended for the eradication of the boll weevil.

The American hog has not had his day in Congress, but the enemies of boll weevil have had theirs. The prevention of the devastation of the boll weevil has been looked after as best we could. It is now time to pay some attention to the American hog. I desire to insert in the RECORD a statement of the moneys expended by the United States Department of Agriculture in the study of hog cholera. Prior to 1887 the expenditures were not classified in detail, but I will put them in as best I can. The statement which I desire to be made a part of the Record, without reading, shows that sums amounting to about $229,418.39 have been expended by the bureau from 1899 to 1913, inclusive; $89,564.32 was expended during the 10-year period from 1904 to 1913, indicating an average expenditure on hog cholera for the last 10 years of $8,956.43 per year. I ask that this statement be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. KENYON. That is what the Government has done per year in the last 10 years to assist in blotting out the ravages of hog cholera. That is an insignificant sum. On the other hand, Congress has appropriated year after year hundreds of thousands of dollars to purchase garden seed for free distribu-tion by Members of Congress. The seed purchased for this purpose have cost this Government many more hundreds of thousands of dollars, and if the money that has been spent in garden seed had been spent for the eradication of hog cholera we would not have had the situation which to-day exists. So I am merely pleading for less "pork barrel" and more pork meat.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Can the Senator from Iowa give us any idea as what has actually been accomplished?

Mr. KENYON. I am going to try to do so.
Mr. JONES. Will the Senator further on state what has been spent by each State?

Mr. KENYON. Yes. Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. JONES. Has the Senator any information which would enable him to tell us how much the States have actually expended?

Mr. KENYON. Yes. For the eradication of the boll weevil $100,000,000. It would seem where such great economic waste Mr. KENYON. Yes. For the eradication of the boll weevil was going on that entered not only into the prosperity of our the Government has spent in the last 10 years $2,133,951.80, while it has spent $89,564.32 for the suppression of hog cholera. In addition to that vast amount expended for the eradication of the boll weevil, Congress has made specific appropriations during the years from 1905 to 1908. I am not criticizing those appropriations in any way; they went for a good purpose; I would have voted for them had I been here; but I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate to the small appropriation in comparison which has been made available in the hogcholera fight.

The Department of Agriculture claims that in the year 1912, I think it was, the boll weevil caused a loss to the cotton crop in this country of about $20,000,000, and a conservative estimate of the loss during the last 10 years would perhaps be $200,000,000.

The purpose which the Senator from Ohio and myself have in mind in presenting these matters to the Senate is because the matter is now being discussed before the Committee on Agriculture, and we thought possibly we might have as large an attendance in the Senate as before the committee, and that, in any event, we would get these matters into the Record for thought. I want to assure the Senate-

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do. Mr. WORKS. So far as I have been able to see, the one important thing which should appeal to the Senate in dealing with this matter has not been touched by either the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I am not through; just give me an oppor-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.
Mr. WORKS. I shall certainly give the Senator all the time he desires, so far as I am individually concerned; but there has been a great deal of money expended by the Government, according to the statement of the Senator from Iowa, and I should like to have the Senator show, if he can, what beneficial results have followed from the use of this serum. According to a statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the loss of hogs has increased immensely during the four years that the serum has been in use. I do not know whether the Senator from Iowa has any figures or data that would cover that phase of the case.

Mr. KENYON. I have exactly; I have a mass of data that I hesitate about using. I was going to put them into my remarks, but I hesitate about taking up the time of the Senate to do so. I wish, however, to say to the Senator that there is not any question of doubt in my mind that there are two sides to the proposition of the serum treatment. In our State we have lost thousands of dollars by bad serum. This serum business, like every other business, offers a fine field for the grafters; they have gone into it, and they have manufactured bad serum. We have had many losses from such serums.

I am not taking the position at all that the serum treatment is absolutely and certainly a remedy, and I am not aligning myself on the side of the serum treatment nor against it. I say there is so much discussion, so much uncertainty about the serum treatment that that in itself is an argument in favor of a large appropriation which the Secretary of Agriculture may use in further investigating the serum treatment and its results; and I expect to put into the Record some of the figures of Dr. Stange, of my State, who has charge of the plant at Ames, showing the actual result of the use of the serum that is manufactured there as to various herds. I also am going to place in the RECORD some letters denouncing the serum treatment in unmeasured terms, and contending that, if Congress or the Secretary of Agriculture would absolutely stop all shipments of serum, it would be better, and that the disease would be sooner eradicated. That is one of the uncertainties of this problem. I am, however, coming to the matters the Senator suggests in a few moments. I am glad if there is any question involved here that excites any interest at all.

The other proposition that I laid down in commencing is the economic one in the movement, that this not only affects the agricultural classes of this country, who are entitled to consideration, but it affects the question of the high cost of living; and it is not only in the actual loss of the meat that the cost of living is affected, but this enters into the question of the production of beef cattle. We often hear the question asked, "Why has the beef production in the agricultural States of the Middle West fallen off so much during recent years?" One of the prime reasons, in my judgment, is this very thing—the ravages of hog cholera.

A man who is a practical farmer, as I am, knows that the cattle industry and the profits therein are dependent to some extent upon the raising of hogs. The hogs follow the cattle; they eat from the cattle; they are practically no expense. hogs are the profit of the farmer in cattle raising. If the farmer is to have a profit from his cattle, it is absolutely necessary for him to have hogs to follow with the cattle. With the great devastation of the herds by cholera, it would not be profitable for the farmer to engage in the stock-raising business; or, at least, a great many farmers would feel that they could not longer run this risk, as they have been doing, and hence many of them are selling their crops instead of feeding them to cattle.

There have personally come to my attention instances where farmers have lost their entire herds of hogs, amounting in some instances to three or four bundred head. The farmers were feeding those swine along with their cattle, expecting to come out even on the cattle and to make some profit on the hogs; but with those losses going on, the farmer would become a bankrupt if he continued in the cattle-raising business. There would be thousands of farmers who would engage in stock raising if they could be reasonably assured that they would not lose their swine from this plague.

Now, what can Congress do? I realize that that is a very debatable question. It is the theory of those who are proposing liberal appropriations that there must be cooperation between the States and the Federal Government in eradicating the plague. There is another step that must be taken. The complaint has been made of the shipment of quack serums into the various States, which have been used by the farmers to the destruction of their herds, and it is estimated that the farmers in my State have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars within the year for fake serums. That has been the experience of other States. I hold in my hand a little article from Fargo, N. Dak., which is as follows:

STUNG BY FAKE CHOLERA CURE—FARMERS OF NORTH DAKOTA ARE VICTIMS AND LOSE HOGS VALUED AT $500,000.

FARGO, N. DAK., December 30.

Farmers of North Dakota have paid more than $20,000 for fake serums advertised as preventives of hog cholera, according to the State food commissioner, Prof. D. F. Ladd, of the State agricultural college, Prof. Ladd estimated the loss to farmers through the death of animals from hog cholera in the last four months at more than $500,000.

The rules of the Department of Agriculture with relation to this matter were not effective until July 1, 1913. I am inclined to think that if the rules of the Department of Agriculture were strictly enforced and they could adopt a rule under the act that has been passed providing for an inspection of every particle of serum before it is shipped in interstate commerce, it would meet the question to some extent; but money is needed for that very inspection. If the rules of the Department of Agriculture will not bring about the desired result with relation to fake serums, then we must have a law to prevent the shipment of these serums in interstate commerce until there has been a governmental inspection or a State inspection. I shall shortly introduce a bill covering this. The serum treatment has been a free field for the grafter, and there is no doubt that the farmers have been deceived and robbed by fake serums. The serum treatment can not be successful if the serums are bad, and some way must be devised to carry out rigidly the rules of the Agricultural Department with reference to these serums, and the farmer must be protected against the faker and the grafter in the serum business. I do not mean to advocate the serum treatment, but, as suggested before, I do say that the confusion concerning it is an argument in favor of a liberal appropriation, so that the Department of Agriculture may pursue its investigations along this line. I am anxious to get at the facts.

Dr. Dorset, Chief of the Biochemical Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry, is the discoverer or inventor of hog-cholera serum. He has been assisted in this work by Dr. Chas. M. McBryde and W. B. Niles, and others have undoubtedly contributed thereto.

Dr. Dorset defines hog cholera as follows:

Hog cholera is a very contagious, highly fatal disease peculiar to swine, which causes the death of from forty to sixty millions of dollars worth of hogs annually. Hog cholera has no relation to any other disease of man or animals. It is caused by a minute germ that exists in the blood and body fluids of hogs sick of the disease.

I am not going into the question of germs or other medical terms with relation to hog cholera, further than to say that the germ of hog cholera is classed with the "invisible microorganisms," and in this respect it resembles those which bring about a number of other diseases of animals and men, notably yellow fever, contagious pleuropneumonia, South African horse sickness, and foot-and-mouth disease. Anything which tends to lower the health of the animal may be regarded as a predisposing cause, such as improper feeding, insanitary condition of hog lots, damp or cold sleeping places, filthy watering and food troughs.

The above conditions can not produce hog cholera, but they can aid to a considerable extent, owing to the unhealthy condition of the hogs. However, it is necessary for a hog to contract one of the germs of cholera before it can be affected. The sick hog is the most dangerous factor in the distribution of this disease. There are many ways in which the disease can be carried to well herds. Dogs frequently carry the germ; in fact, this is a very common way; again, it can be carried by the turkey buzzard; also, by the common crow. I know of several instances where this bird had partaken of a meal from hogs which had died from the cholera, then carried the disease in this way into well herds on some other farm, where they chanced to light. I am also informed by reliable farmers that the disease can be carried downstream from herds which are affected above. I know of one instance where a whole herd was wiped out in this way. The disease can also be brought onto the farm by the purchase of new stock for breeding purposes. I recall such an instance, where practically the entire herd was lost from such exposure.

Of course, Mr. President, there is a great deal in the proposition that must rest with the farmer himself. Sanitary conditions, methods of feeding, and quarantine are matters that he should be instructed in through the agents sent out by the Department of Agriculture in their demonstration work.

After hog cholera has been prevalent on a farm, the premises should be thoroughly fumigated in order to guard against new herds becoming affected by reason of being placed in such pens and hog houses. A person can not be too careful in cleaning up his premises after the disease has once been stamped out, for, if great care is not exercised, it will again appear. Of course, the germ will die out in time, but it is impossible to give a stated period, as it varies in different sections of the country. I understand that hard, freezing weather will kill the germ, but it is not advisable to place hogs in pens previously occupied by sick hogs until three or four months after the disease has disappeared.

The majority of cases of cholera make their appearance in the early summer and fall. In Iowa it started in very early in the summer last year, and I think this has been true for several years past, so far as Iowa and other Middle Western States are concerned. It has been shown that the loss from hog cholera has been as high as 100 per cent in some herds, while perhaps the average will run from 60 to 80 per cent. In some instances the hog is worthless after having been affected with this disease, for the reason that he has become stunted. It is not best to place hogs recently recovered from hog cholera with a well herd, for in all probability the herd will become affected. Sick hogs should be kept from the well herd for sev-eral months, unless the well herd has had the serum treatment, which, it is claimed, will prevent the spread of the disease in the herd.

I am indebted for many of the facts with relation to hog cholera to Farmers' Bulletin No. 379, of the Department of Agriculture, which is a valuable bulletin for the farmer.

I ask permission to insert at this point, without reading, a number of extracts from that bulletin which may be of interest to the farmers who may read my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PREDISPOSING CAUSES.

While the specific cause of hog cholera is the minute microorganism or germ just referred to, there are many factors which may render a herd more susceptible to the disease. In general, anything which tends to lower the health of the animals may be regarded as a predisposing cause. Among such predisposing factors there may be mentioned improper feeding, an insanitary condition of the hog lots, damp or cold sleeping places, and dirty drinking and feeding troughs. Of course insanitary surroundings and poor feed can not in themselves produce hog cholera, but they lower the vitality of hogs to such an extent that they become comparatively easy victims of any disease-producing germs to which they are exposed.

WAYS IN WHICH THE HOG-CHOLERA GERM REACHES A HERD.

WAYS IN WHICH THE HOG-CHOLERA GERM REACHES A HERD.

Although the conditions just mentioned undoubtedly exert considerable influence upon the relative resisting powers of hogs to hog cholera, the disease can be started in a herd only by introducing the germ which causes it. This germ is always present in the bodies of sick hogs, and is thrown off from them in large numbers in the feces and urine, thus contaminating the yards or pens in which sick hogs are kept. The most dangerous factor in spreading hog cholera is therefore the sick hog, but any agency which: ight serve to carry a particle of dirt from infected yards may be the means of starting an outbreak of the disease.

Aside from the danger of introducing infection through the hogs themselves it must be remembered that the germ of the disease, which as already stated is infinitesimally small, may be transported in a minute particle of dirt on the feet of attendants or neighbors who have previously visited farms where hog cholera exists. It may also be carried in this way by dogs and by crows and other birds. It has been claimed, and considerable proof has been brought to show it, that the disease may be carried downstream from herds which are affected above. It is therefore well to avoid placing hogs so that they will have access to streams which pass through other farms. As diseased hogs are frequently transported by rail, it is quite possible for infection to be introduced into a farm by litter dropped from cars in transit, especially if hogs on the farm have access to the tracks.

After hog cholera has visited a farm, the lots, hog houses, feeding troughs, and implements used for cleaning have naturally become contaminated with the germs of the disease, and if new stock is placed in such yards soon after these were occupied by sick hogs the new hogs are very likely to contract the disease, but if such yards are left unoccupied the germs will die out after a while. Unfortunately, it is not possible to tell with certainty just how long a time is required for these germs to die out, this uncertainty being due to the fact that conditions on different farms vary widely, and also because the weather conditions, which have an important influence upon the vitality of the hog-cholera germ, vary from time to time and in different sections of the country. In view of this uncertainty it is safest to wait as long as possible before placing new hogs in lots that have been infected. Such premises should not be restocked sooner than three months after the last hog has been removed. Before restocking, the premises should be cleaned and thoroughly disinfected in the manner described under the heading "General preventive measures."

APPEARANCE OF A HOG AFTER DEATH FROM HOG CHOLERA.

In regard to the examination of hog carcasses on the farm, it may be well to state that while hog cholera is not communicable to man there is always danger of the hog being infected with other diseases, such as tuberculosis and anthrax, which are highly dangerous to man, and for this reason care should be exercised in examining carcasses of sick hogs, so as to avoid a cut or scratch on the hands, which might serve as a point for the inoculation of disease.

SICKNESS CAUSED BY IMPROPER FEEDING.

Although hogs are frequently made sick by improper feeding, there is rarely any cause for mistaking such illness for hog cholera, the only trouble of this character which is likely to give rise to confusion being in the case of swill-fed hogs. Dr. V. A. Moore has reported a disease among swill-fed hogs which closely resembled hog cholera and which was directly traceable to the presence of powdered scaps in the slops. Some of these scaps contain a large amount of alkali, and when mixed with the garbage used for feeding hogs will bring about lesions in the internal organs which are very similar to those seen in hog cholera. In most cases it will probably not be difficult to distinguish such a disease from hog cholera, especially if the mode of feeding be considered. If the illness is due to the presence of alkali in the swill, a change of food should result in a prompt improvement in the condition of the animals. If this does not occur, then, of course, hog cholera or some other germ disease should be at once suspected.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Department of Agriculture took up the study of hog cholera in 1878 more in an experimental way than anything else, but that information is now obsolete in view of the discoveries of recent years. The department, however, has had a very small amount of money to use. In 1878 there was an appropriation of $10,000 for investigating diseases of swine and also contagious diseases of domestic animals. This appropriation was renewed from year to year, and some scientists investigated the disease, but with little good result. Laboratories during the period from 1878 to 1885 were established in the department and the Bureau of Animal Industry was organized. The early work consisted, for the most austry was organized. The early work consisted, for the most part, in a study of the distribution, classification, and mode of transmission of swine diseases, supplemented by laboratory investigations looking to the cause of the disease. The result of these investigations led to the suggestion of quarantine and disinfection as a preventive. While these examinations and experiments were as to domestic animals in general, in the year 1885, after an exhaustive investigation, announcement was made by the department that one of the great causes of loss among swine was a contagious disease known as hog cholera, caused by a motile bacterium, which was named the hog-cholera bacillus. The Bureau of Animal Industry then commenced a long series of investigations, which had for their object the development of a method of treatment of hog cholera. These investigations were based on the theory that hog-cholera bacillus was the cause of the disease, therefore that microorganism was used for the production of vaccines and serums.

However, after much study it was found that this experiment was a failure, although at different times it was thought that cure for this disease had been discovered; but after exhaustive experiments where horses and other animals were inoculated with hog-cholera bacillus in order to secure a serum for the treatment of hogs with cholera it was discovered that the serum taken from these animals would not effect a cure, although for a time the department was very much encouraged, but after a field demonstration covering a period of some four years they came to the conclusion that the serum would not answer the purpose for which it was intended.

The failure of these tests to cure hog cholera, and the further fact that hogs recovering from this disease were always immune thereafter, led the bureau to believe that perhaps, after all, they did not fully understand the cause of the disease. that time they came to the conclusion that in all probability the hog cholera bacillus was not the only factor which caused this disease, so the department decided to make further experiments. In the year 1903 there was discovered a fatal disease of swine in the State of Iowa which could not apparently be distinguished from hog cholera. This disease was caused by an invisible microorganism, which the experts of the department claimed existed in the blood and fluids of sick hogs. It was further discovered that this germ was so minute that it could not be found by the highest powers of the microscope to be had at that time.

When this disease was first discovered in the State of Iowa, upon careful investigation it was found that this invisible microorganism was identified with all outbreaks of hog cholera, and the department came to the conclusion that the failure of all their earlier attempts to secure an effective serum was due to the fact that they had failed to take this invisible microorganism into account. The department spent considerable time after the discovery of this disease in trying to arrive at the true cause of hog cholera, and the relationship of hog-cholera bacillus to hog cholera, as well as to the extent of this new disease found in the State of Iowa and its relation to hog cholera. The bureau carried on exhaustive investigations and considered the disease in all its phases. These experiments were considered of vast importance, and the conclusions, in brief, are as follows:

1. Hog cholera is caused by an invisible microorganism which exists in the blood and other body fluids of sick hogs.

2. The so-called "hog-cholera bacillus" is not the cause of hog cholera, and at the most is merely an accessory factor in the disease.

3. Hogs that recover from hog cholera are thereafter immune. Hogs that recover from artificial infection with the invisible virus are rendered immune against the natural disease, whereas infection with the hog-cholera bacillus does not confer immunity against hog cholera.

The bureau deemed the above investigation of the utmost importance, for it opened the way for the production of effi-cient methods for the treatment of the disease, and it had also shown where the department had failed in their earlier attempts to control the disease.

The investigations and experiments carried on by the bureau and the conclusions reached relative to the treatment of hog cholera have been confirmed by experts in this disease in foreign countries where hog cholera exists.

During the year 1905 the bureau started experiments with the view of using the hogs themselves as a source of protective serum, and toward the close of the year it was demonstrated to the entire satisfaction of the bureau that hogs could be protected from hog cholera by the following method:

A hog which is immune against hog cholera, either naturally or as a result of an attack of the disease, is injected with large amounts of blood taken from a pig sick of hog cholera. This injection when properly performed does no material harm to the immune. Within a week or 10 days blood is drawn from the immune hog, and this blood after defiberation is used to protect susceptible pigs.

It was not possible to make many tests during the year 1905, but they were carried on during the year 1906 and proved to the entire satisfaction of the department that they had discovered a remedy that would prevent hog cholera. It was deemed important that this discovery should be protected by a United States patent, for the method had been discovered in the Government laboratories, and this would insure its use to all citizens of this country under certain restrictions laid down by the department. Therefore application was made and patent granted by the United States for the manufacture of this serum to the Government or to any of its citizens without the payment of any royalty thereon.

The following facts were brought out by these experiments:

The following facts were brought out by these experiments:

1. When hogs immune against hog cholera are injected with suitable amounts of blood taken from hogs sick of hog cholera the blood serum of the immune acquires the power to protect nonimmune hogs against an otherwise fatal exposure to the disease. This process of producing serum is known as "hyperimmunization."

2. The serum from hyperimmunization."

2. The serum from hyperimmunized hogs may be used to protect susceptible hogs in one of two ways: (a) The serum alone is injected. This confers an immunity lasting for three weeks to two months. (b) The serum is injected simultaneously with a minute amount of blood taken from a hog sick of hog cholera. This is known as the "simultaneous method," and it produces an immunity which lasts for many months, if not for life.

3. The serum is essentially a preventive. It does not cure hogs already visibly sick, but it may be used successfully as a cure if administered in the very early stages of the disease.

The Government confined their experiments to hogs kept at

The Government confined their experiments to hogs kept at different experimental stations up until the year 1907, at which time they concluded these experiments had reached such a satisfactory stage that it was deemed advisable to try field experiments; so they selected several hundred head of hogs on different farms throughout central Iowa for this test, and the following method was used in carrying on this work:

Class 1. Healthy herds treated for the purpose of protection against hog cholera which existed on near-by farms. In each herd a certain number of hogs were not treated, but left to serve as controls. In most of the herds in this class the disease did not appear in either the treated hogs or the controls. In a few of these herds, however, hog cholera appeared some weeks after vaccination among the controls, the average loss being 68 per cent of the untreated controls, while of the treated hogs in the same herd associating with the sick control animals none died of treatment were apparently well. In these exposed herds 4 per cent of the treated hogs died, while more than 89 per cent of the untreated control animals succumbed.

Class 3, Herds in which hog cholera existed at the time of treatment. In these herds the effort was made to treat only those herds where disease had not progressed very far, as past experience had shown that the serum was essentially a protective agent rather than a cure. As a general rule, this third class of herds contained comparatively few visibly sick hogs, but yet a sufficient number to show clearly that hog cholera was present, this being confirmed by post-mortem examination in each case. In these sick herds 13 per cent of those that received the serum were lost, whereas of the untreated control animals 75 per cent died. The success of these practical tests, following the uniformly good results obtained in the previous experimental work, was sufficient to show that in this new serum the department possessed a substance which could be utilized to reduce, if not ultimately to entirely eliminate, losses from hog cholera.

After these experiments had been carried on for some time.

After these experiments had been carried on for some time, the department sent a notice of the same to the different States, and requested that they send a representative to investigate the work being carried on in the State of Iowa, and also that they might become acquainted with the methods used in the manufacture and application of the serum. Some twenty-odd States took advantage of this invitation and sent representatives to investigate the work being carried on. This was during the year 1908. Since then the department has continued its experiments relative to reducing the cost of this serum, and now have succeeded in producing an effective serum that can be had for a cost of from 15 to 40 cents per treatment of each hog.

I desire to insert here, as a part of my remarks, a statement of the Bureau of Animal Industry as to the methods of producing hog-cholera serum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The matter referred to is as follows:

A vigorous immune hog—that is, one which has recovered from an attack of hog cholera or one which has been exposed to the disease without contracting it—is treated with a large quantity of blood from a hog sick of hog cholera. After a week or two blood is drawn from the immune by cutting off the end of the tail. After standing, the blood clot is removed and the serum or fluid portion of the blood is mixed with a weak solution of carbolic acid and filled into sterilized bottles. We have in this fluid portion of the immune's blood the serum which will protect hogs from hog cholera. This serum is used in either one of two ways, namely, (1) the serum inoculation and (2) the simultaneous inoculation.

These two methods of treatment are carried out as follows:

Serum inoculation.—The hogs which are to be protected are injected on the inside of the hind leg with a suitable dose of the serum alone. This injection will serve to protect hogs from hog cholera for several weeks, and in some cases for a longer time. But if the hog is not exposed to hog cholera within a few weeks after this treatment, the immunity which is conferred by the serum will gradually lessen in degree and the hog may again become susceptible. If, however, the hog is exposed to hog cholera within a short time after the injection of the serum, the immunity becomes, so far as experiments have shown, of permanent and lifelong duration.

Simultaneous inoculation.—In this form of vaccination the same serum is used as is employed when the serum alone is used, but in addition to the serum there is injected on the opposite side of the body, in the same manner as the serum, a very small amount of blood taken from a hog sick of the cholera. This simultaneous injection of serum and virulent blood confers upon the injected pig a permanent and lasting immunity, and is therefore to be recommended in cases of well herds which may not be exposed for some months after the treatment.

Mr. KENYON. The department has been handicapp

Mr. KENYON. The department has been handicapped in its work in the past years for the want of proper funds to carry on this work. Congress, however, last year made an appropriation of $75,000 for the continuation of this work, but it was not sufficient, and the funds were exhausted early in the fall, so far as Iowa was concerned. I realize the fact that the department was handicapped for the want of sufficient serum to carry on the work, and for the further reason, as has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio, that the appropriation was not available until the first day of July, 1913. At this time the bureau is in a position, if it can secure a liberal appropriation, to fight this plague, and to successfully combat the disease, but it will be necessary to have a good portion of this money made available for immediate use, in order that the bureau may become properly organized.

I ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks a letter from President Pearson, of our State Agricultural College, emphasizing the fact that a dollar early in the year is better than three or four dollars later in the summer, when the disease of hog cholera is in full force.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the letter may be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter referred to will be found in the appendix to Mr. KENYON'S remarks.

Mr. KENYON. The bureau carried on experiments in the following States during the year 1913 and is continuing the same at this time, namely, in Nebraska, Indiana, Missouri, and Iowa. The department has no full reports available relative to the work carried on in the counties of the States named, such as Dallas County, Iowa, Pettis County, Mo., and Montgomery County, Ind., and at present is unable to give a very definite statement. The department, however, is able to ascertain at this time that the losses from hog cholera in these counties have been distinctly less than in either of the two years immediately

That brings up the question which the Senator from California [Mr. Works] suggested, that with this effective serum, as it has been termed by him, the losses have continually increased. Even if the serum were perfectly effective, it might not be strange that the losses should have increased, because it has been absolutely impossible in Ohio or in Iowa or in other States to manufacture this serum in sufficient quantities to meet the demand. I was at the Iowa Agricultural College some two months ago, and at that time they told me that they were 13 weeks behind, and I think in the State of Ohio they are about a thousand orders behind all the time; so that they can only treat certain numbers; and the disease is increasing simply because of the lack of the serum, granting that the serum is the best treatment and that it can do the work.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. JONES. Has the Senator any information as to what it would cost to install a plant by which the United States Government could furnish sufficient serum to take care of the situation throughout the country?

Mr. KENYON. No; I have not. I assume that it would cost a great deal of money. I am not advocating that; but I do

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. In just a moment. I do feel, however, that those engaged in the commercial business of manufacturing and shipping serum should be under governmental inspection.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that that is certainly true, or else the Government should produce the serum and itself send it out, or the States.

Mr. KENYON. I think the States can produce serum under cooperation with the Government.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa vield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.
Mr. STERLING. The Senator may have already made the statement, but if so, I did not hear it, as to how long this serum treatment has been going on. For what length of time has there been such treatment?

Mr. KENYON. Dr. Dorset's patent was granted, I think, some five or six years ago. I can not be absolutely accurate as to that; but I would give it as my estimate that it has been in use for some five or six years, though not in anywise to the extent that it has been used in the last two or three The general use of this serum, I think, has been con-years. fined, say, to the last three years.

Mr. STERLING. Ought not this serum treatment for that length of time to have demonstrated whether or not it is a successful method of treatment?

Mr. KENYON. Well, as was suggested by the Senator from Ohio, there are still people who do not believe in vaccination for smallpox. There are those who are not yet satisfied as to its efficacy. The reports I have from the Iowa Agricultural College show that the treatment has been successful; but, on the other hand, the letters which I have from Dr. Lowry, of Ottumwa, Iowa, and others are to the effect that most of the hog-cholera cases are due to the serum.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to his colleague?

Mr. KENYON. I do. Mr. CUMMINS. I think, if my colleague would describe, in a general way, how the serum is produced, Senators would have a better idea of the difficulties which attend its manufacture and the expense incident to it. It is not easy to establish a plant for the production of this medicine, nor is it inexpensive to operate one.

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad my colleague has made that suggestion. I have been hurrying along, because I did not feel there was, on the part of the Senate, much interest in the subject.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The question as to the efficacy of this treatment was raised a moment ago, when the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] asked whether this treatment had proved a success. Some time ago I happened to be present at an interstate meeting which was attended by the former Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, when that very question was asked. He replied that where the serum used was prepared according to the formula recommended by the Department of Agriculture, and used as recommended by the department, it had proved a uniform success.

Mr. KENYON. I think very few instances can be found where it has not been a success where that kind of serum has

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I thought force might be added to the argument made by the Senator who now has the floor by calling attention to that statement, coming, as it does, from perhaps the highest possible authority, because probably more of this serum has been used under his supervision than under the supervision of any other man. Secretary Wilson made that unqualified statement.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is true; and he was really a practical farmer.

In reply to the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. Cummins]and that may answer other suggestions as to why this serum has not worked out better—I will say that the difficulties he suggests are true. The manufacture of hog-cholera serum is a very difficult and a very expensive proposition. In the first place, there must be an immune hog—I know this does not appeal to my friend from California, but I am going to go through with it anyhow; that is, a hog that has been through hog cholera or that has been vaccinated and is immune. They take a cholera-infected hog and inject into the immune hog, by a very interesting process, through a vein in the ear, the blood of the cholera-infected hog, sometimes to the amount of a quart. Then the immune hog, with the cholera-infected blood within him, is kept for ten days or two weeks. Then commences the process of cutting off portions of his tail—which he never seems to enjoy-and the blood drops down into a sterilized bottle. That is the serum.

Mr. WORKS. I have not, I will say to the Senator, very much favored the serum treatment for man or beast.

Mr. KEALL in my statement. WORKS. Mr. President-Mr. KENYON. Then I was not so very much out of the way

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

The Senator from Iowa seems to intimate that Mr. WORKS. I am an unbeliever and not subject to conviction. That is a I am very much interested in what the Senator from Iowa is saying. I think this is a very interesting question and a important one, and I am looking for light on the subject.

Mr. KENYON. I did not mean in any way to insinuate that the Senator was not looking for light, but I felt confident that he did not believe in the serum treatment, as a great many other people do not.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, this serum is used largely as a preventive?

Mr. KENYON. Yes

Mr. WARREN. To prevent the disease rather than to cure it?

Mr. KENYON. Yes

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator will give us further information on that point.

Mr. KENYON. I have some figures on that. After the hog is sick, if he is only slightly sick, the serum is sometimes used, but after the disease has obtained a virulent form it is not used alone, but the virus is used, viz, the double or simultaneous treatment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KENYON. I do. He has rather a quizzical look on his face, and I think I will yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My question is called forth by the to me unknown method of extracting or procuring hog-cholera serum. I can imagine that a large part of the expense attendant upon the operation would be the purchase of the hogs from which this serum could be obtained.

Mr. KENYON, Yes. Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How much of the serum can be obtained from one hog? I suppose it quits when the tail is exhausted?

Mr. KENYON. It depends upon the size.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It depends upon the size of the tail, does it not?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; there is more to this than a mere It is a very interesting tale, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to his colleague?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish my colleague would give the Senate some idea of the number of hogs that our own agricultural college has been compelled to secure in order to make this serum. Mr. KENYON. I can not do it accurately. Can the Senator do so?

Mr. CUMMINS. The number is very large, is it not? Mr. KENYON. Oh, yes; it is a very large number.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not the number precisely in my mind, but it is a very large number, and the matter is attended with a great deal of expense.

Mr. KENYON. I would not attempt to say how many there were, but I know there were a great many.

Some who have used the serum treatment are so confident about it that they are selling hogs with a guaranty against cholera. I have seen a number of advertisements of that kind.

I desire now to give some of the practical results of this treatment. I had not intended to do it, but if it will excite a little interest, I am glad to do so.

The Government experimented in Pettis County, Mo., Montgomery County, Ill., and Dallas County, Iowa. They experimented on the healthy hogs with the two treatments, the serum alone and the double or simultaneous treatment, which is different from the serum treatment only in that the actual blood of the diseased hog is also injected into the hog under treatment as well as the serum. That is a very dangerous thing, of course, and can be done only by experts. Their figures were as follows:

In Pettis County, Mo., the number of healthy hogs experimented on with serum alone was 3,825. Of those 6 died, probably the natural result. In Montgomery County 943 were experimented on, of which 33 died. In Dalias County none were experimented on. The average loss was eight-tenths of 1 per cent. With the double treatment, in Pettis County they experimented on 500, and there were no losses; in Montgomery County, 3.711, with 36 losses; in Dallas County, 2,760, with no losses. Out of a total of 6,971 there were 36 losses, or five-tenths of 1 per cent.

As to diseased herds, they experimented with serum alone in Pettis County on 3.801 hogs, of which 597 died. That was even after the hogs were diseased, but not, I take it, to a very extended degree. In Montgomery County they experimented on 2,797, of which 610 died. In Dallas County they experimented on 4,959, of which 1,693 died. Out of 11,557 diseased hogs 2.910 died with the serum treatment alone, and with the deuble treatment, out of 7.026 hogs experimented on at the Missouri. Indiana, and Iowa stations, there were 204 lost—less than 2.8 per cent.

Dr. Charles H. Stange, in charge of the State Biological Laboratory at Ames. Iowa, sent me a statement as to their treatment, showing, first, the number treated with serum alone, the well and the sick, and then the number given the simultaneous treatment.

The total number of hogs treated in healthy herds was 1,887: the total number of hogs lost was 44. The total number of hogs treated in diseased herds was 3,680; the total number of hogs lost was 758, of which 986 were sick when they were treated, or a loss of 161 per cent, while the general run of loss in herds where hog cholera entered has been from 60 to 85 per cent. So the practical result of this treatment in our part of the country has been to reduce the loss from 60 to 85 per cent down to 161 per cent, even where the hogs were sick when treated, and to 25 per cent where the hogs were treated before becoming sick.

I desire permission to insert in the RECORD at this point the returns of the experiments at Ames, and also the returns of the experiments by the Government in Ohio, Indiana, Missouri,

Mr. KENYON. At this time there are 20 or 30 States engaged in the distribution of hog-cholera serum to farmers, and their reports are not available. I have shown on this map the different States and the amounts they have expended in serum plants. I wish to insert in the RECORD, without reading, a list of the States having serum laboratories and a list of the States which purchase serum for distribution but do not manufacture it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following States have small investments for the manufacture or distribution of hog-cholera serum: Delaware, a very small sum from funds of live stock sanitary board, amount not known; Maryland, $5,000; Mississippi, $5,000; New York, no definite amount, meager fund available from college appropriation; North Carolina, $1,500; North Dakota, $3,000; Oklahoma, $3,750; Wisconsin, initial appropriation, $600; South Dakota, amount not known.

The following States do not manufacture, but purchase serum for distribution Maine, amount not known; Vermont, no definite amount; Virginia, $3,000 to begin, subsequent fund derived from sale of serum.

Mr. KENYON. The Bureau of Animal Industry has recently been advised that the State of Missouri has increased her appropriation for the manufacture of hog-cholera serum to $50,000 and that the State of Idaho has appropriated the sum of $5,000 for the manufacture of serum in that State.

The figures given as to the investments in the various States show that they are awake to the conditions and are doing what they can to thwart this disease. It is probable that the various States can manufacture the serum necessary.

If the States can take care of the manufacture of the serum. and the Federal Government can cooperate in sending out men to instruct in the use of the serum, to instruct as to sanitary conditions, quarantine, and the general treatment of hog cholera, and if the regulations in relation to the manufacture and shipment of serum are enforced, it would seem that this cooperation of the State and Federal Governments can blot out the

I have suggested before that the question is frequently propounded, whether the serum treatment is good for anything. I have had letters from farmers stating that their herds had been lost through the use of "fake" serums, and I know of such cases. I submit some letters showing the use of the serum in various States and the good results coming therefrom; also letters showing the bad results therefrom.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. Is this serum included? Mr. KENYON. What serum does the Senator mean? Mr. WORKS. I refer to the serum that has been spoken of here as recommended by the Agriculture Department as being

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. WORKS. I wondered whether or not that was included.
Mr. KENYON. No; that is not included. This serum is manufactured in different places and is shipped in interstate commerce. The bad and "fake" serum treatment is, of course, the wrong thing, and the farmer must be certain that the treatment is right before he uses it. I feel that this should be covered in some way by Government inspection. It is, of course, fatal to inoculate a herd with bad serum. You might as well vaccinate a human being with bad virus.

I ask permission to insert at this point some letters from farmers and veterinary surgeons against the serum treatment, as it is only my purpose to present all sides of this question, and the discussion raging around the serum treatment is indicative of the necessity of further experiments and more work. I also wish to insert some newspaper clippings on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. KENYON. Upon reflection, I will ask later to have these inserted.

The following extract is from a letter written by the professor of veterinary science at the Kansas Agricultural College, who is in charge of hog-cholera serum production in the State of Kansas:

I estimate that the average dose has been in the neighborhood of 30 cubic centimeters per hog, which gives as a result approximately 275,000 head of hogs vaccinated by the simultaneous method and 275,000 vaccinated with the serum alone. I estimate that, under the conditions and the general infection of this State, a conservative estimate of the number of hogs saved through the vaccination would be at least half the number vaccinated, or 275,000. This is certainly a conservative estimate.

That would be a saving to Kansas of over $2,000,000. The State veterinarian of Ohio writes as follows:

The State Veterinarian of Onio Writes as follows:

It is my opinion that at least 50 per cent of the animals in infected herds were saved by the serum, and I believe, further, that this is a very low estimate. Taking this as a basis, then, we have the following: Of the total number of swine treated to date (313,000) 72 per cent, or 225,360 swine, were in infected herds. It is reasonable to assume that at least two-thirds of these would have died from the effects of disease had they not been treated with serum. In other words, there would have been a loss of 150,240 swine, with an average value of at least $10, or $1,502,400. This does not take into account the healthy herds which were treated, nor does it take into account the extra value of the large per cent of pure-bred or registered herds.

The following is an extract from the report of the agricultural experiment station of the Agricultural College of California:

A conservative estimate of the number of hogs saved by the antihogcholera serum is 30,000 head. The cost of the serum to farmers, in addition to that distributed free as provided by law, has been about $33,000. Estimating the average value of a hog in California at $9.20, the protection provided these 30,000 hogs has meant a saving to the ranchers of at least $240,000. This does not include the profits resulting from the breeding and profitable feeding of the hogs saved.

If in all cases the serum had been used as the station recommends—that is, before the disease has gained entrance to the herds—then 99 per cent of all hogs owned by these farmers would probably have lived, instead of only 50 per cent of the untreated hogs and 91.3 per cent of the treated; that is, about $350,000 would have been saved in addition to the $240,000 mentioned above.

As a representative from a great agricultural State—the

As a representative from a great agricultural State-the greatest in the Union-I have been anxious not to raise hypercritical objections relative to various kinds of treatments, but rather to help provide the Agricultural Department with a large enough appropriation for them to carry on their experiments with relation to treatment of this disease that is dissipating the herds of hogs of the farmers of my State. I am doing so without advocating any particular kind of treatment. but merely desirous to have Congress furnish the sinews of war for a fight against this element in the high cost of living. The Bureau of Animal Industry, with a large appropriation, can extend the operations now being carried on in Dallas County, Iowa, Pettis County, Mo., and Montgomery County, Ind., as well as their experiments in Nebraska, to other counties in these States, and can also carry the work to other States in the Union where this disease is creating such havoc among swine. Further, the Bureau of Animal Industry and the agents sent out can cooperate with the State agricultural colleges of the different States and with the county agricultural agents located throughout the country. These agents are under the control of the department, and in direct touch with them. In the experiments in Dallas County, in our State, they were hampered for lack of funds.

I received a letter last year from a member of the legislature of our State, living in Dallas County, who is greatly interested in this proposition, pleading that I secure more money for their experiments. They were then in the midst of their experiments. I took up the matter with the Secretary of Agriculture, and in reply he wrote as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 31, 1913.

Hon. W. S. KENYON, United States Scnate.

DEAR SENATOR KENYON: Replying to your letter of October 27, 1913, regarding the hog choiera demonstration work being carried out in Dallas County, Iowa, it is not possible to set aside additional funds for use in Dallas County during the present fiscal year. The department has already expended for the work in Dallas County a very considerable proportion of the fund appropriated by the last Congress for hog cholera demonstration work. We can not allot additional funds for the lowa experiment without detriment to the work in other States. With the enset of cold weather I believe that hog cholera will be much less prevalent and additional funds at this season of the year would be of little avail. It may be that if Congress decides to continue this work during the next fiscal year the department will need some additional funds to be available in the spring of 1914, as it is essential for success to begin the eradication work early in the year.

Very sincerely,

D. F. Houston, Secretary.

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

As has been said by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, this money is needed soon, as it is essential for success to begin the eradication work early in the year. The experiments in Dallas County could not be carried out as was desired, and as should have been done in order to attain the best results, because of the lack of a few thousand dollars.

I desire to place in the RECORD some suggestions from the Department of Agriculture as to treatment of hog cholera.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, leave

The matter referred to is as follows:

Prevention and treatment of hog cholera. GENERAL PREVENTIVE MEASURES.

All that is necessary to prevent hog cholera.

GENERAL PREVENTIVE MEASURES.

All that is necessary to prevent hog cholera is to keep the germ of the disease away from the herd. It has been shown that in the vast majority of cases this germ is transported mechanically, in the bodies of sick hogs and on the feet of men or animals, including birds. It thus follows that the chances of an outbreak of hog cholera will be greatly lessened, if not completely avoided, if a herd is protected from these carriers of the infection. The enforcement of a complete quarantine is, however, not practicable under average farm conditions, and the best that can be hoped for is the lessening of the opportunity for infection by placing the herd on a part of the farm that will be the least accessible to men or animals from other farms. Hog lots should never be located near public roads if this can be avoided. All newly purchased stock should be kept separate from the main herd for at least 30 days.

In addition to protecting the herd by methods of quarantine, careful attention should be given to the general health of the herd. The hogs should be provided with clean, dry sleeping places and the lots and feeding troughs should be kept clean. It is well occasionally to scatter slaked lime about the lots and to wash and disinfect the troughs. Probably the best disinfectant for this purpose is the compound solution of cresol (U. S. P.), which can be prepared at any drug store. One part of this should be mixed with 30 parts of water and the troughs with water.

After an outbreak of hog cholera the yards and pens should be thoroughly cleaned, all dead hogs should be burned or burled deep with quicklime, the litter should be collected and burned, and lime scattered freely over the ground. The sheds and hog houses should be washed thoroughly with the solution of cresol, as above described, before new stock is brought on the place. Feeding troughs that have been used by sick pigs should be burned if made of wood, but if this is not practicable t

PREVENTION BY INOCULATION.

Careful and persistent attention to general preventive measures, such as quarantine, disinfection, proper feeding, etc., on the part of farmers generally would no doubt result in a material reduction in the yearly losses from hog cholera, and the importance of observing these precautions can not be overestimated. However, as it is regarded as impracticable to enforce a general and completely effective quarantine, the Bureau of Animal Industry has endeavored for a number of years to find a medicine or serum which could be used for preventing hog cholera or for curing hogs sick of that disease. It is a well-known fact that hogs which have recovered from hog cholera are thereafter immune against that disease. The experiments of the Bureau of Animal Industry resulted in the discovery that when such immunes are injected with blood from a sick hog the immune is not made sick, but as a result of this injection its blood acquires the power to protect other hogs from hog cholera. The details of the early experiments which served to establish this fact are given in Bureau of Animal Industry Bulletin 102, which can be obtained only from Superintendent of Documents.

Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.; price, 15 cents. Since that bulletin was issued a great deal of additional work has been carried out, and it has been established beyond question that the early observations were correct and that it is entirely possible to protect hogs if they are treated with serum from a properly treated immune hogs if they are treated with serum from a properly treated infimulae hog.

The method of producing this serum is briefly as follows:

A vigorous immune hog—that is, one which has recovered from an attack of hog cholera or one which has been exposed to the disease without contracting it—is treated with a large quantity of blood from a hog sick of hog cholera. After a week or two blood is drawn from the immune by cutting off the end of the tail. After standing, the blood clot is removed and the serum or fluid portion of the blood is mixed with a weak solution of carbolic acid and filled into sterilized bottles. We have in this fluid portion of the immune's blood the serum which will protect hogs from hog cholera. This serum is used in either one of two ways, namely, (1) the serum inoculation, and (2) the simultaneous inoculation. These two methods of treatment are carried out as follows:

The hogs which are to be protected are injected on the inside of the hind leg with a suitable dose of the serum alone. This injection will serve to protect hogs from hog cholera for several weeks and, in some cases, for a longer time. But if the hog is not exposed to hog cholera within a few weeks after this treatment, the immunity which is conferred by the serum will gradually lessen in degree and the hog may again become susceptible. If, however, the hog is exposed to hog cholera within a short time after the injection of the serum, the immunity becomes, so far as experiments have shown, of permanent and lifelong duration.

From what has been said it will be seen that the injection of the serum alone is especially to be recommended in cases where there is immediate danger of exposure, especially when valuable hogs are carried to fairs and in herds where the disease has already broken out but has not progressed very far. In herds of this character all of the well animals may be treated, and even in the case of slightly sick animals much good may be accomplished by the serum injection.

SIMULTANEOUS INOCULATION.

In this form of vaccination the same serum is used as is employed when the serum alone is used, but in addition to the serum there is injected on the opposite side of the body, in the same manner as the serum, a very small amount of blood taken from a hog sick of hog cholera. This simultaneous injection of serum and virulent blood confers upon the injected pig a permanent and lasting immunity, and is therefore to be recommended in cases of well herds which may not be exposed for some months after the treatment.

SAFETY OF THE METHODS.

Properly prepared serum when used alone, without the employment of blood from a sick hog, is entirely harmless and incapable of giving rise to an attack of hog cholera. Nor does this injection interfere in any way with the growth of the treated hogs.

The simultaneous inoculation, involving as it does the use of a disease-producing virus, requires much mone care when employed than does the serum-alone inoculation, for, if through careless preparation or from any other cause the serum should be weaker than is required, injury to the vaccinated hog might result. This danger, which is extremely slight when carefully tested serum is used, is met with in practically all processes which are now employed for producing a permanent and lasting protection against infectious diseases, and although it would be very desirable to eliminate even this slight element of danger, we can hardly expect to do this without at the same time sacrificing to some extent the high degree of immunity and the prolonged protection which follows the simultaneous method in its present form.

Practically, in deciding which method to use one must be governed largely by the length of immunity which is required. If this is meded for only a few weeks, or if the treatment can be reseated at short intervals, as in the case of exceptionally valuable pure-bred hogs, where the increased cost would not be objected to, the serum alone may be used. In other cases the simultaneous method is recommended. In either process of vaccination it is considered highly desirable for the treatment to be applied by competent veterinarians who have had special training in this class of work, and only such skilled men should employ the simultaneous process. After treatment by the simultaneous method to be herd should be immediately re-treated with the serum alone. When properly performed, the simultaneous inoculation does not seem to injure the hog or to interfere with its growth in any way, and if the precautions indicated above are taken it is regarded as safe enough fo

PRACTICAL TESTS OF BOTH METHODS.

PRACTICAL TESTS OF BOTH METHODS.

As before stated, the serum has been tested by the Bureau of Animal Industry in an extended manner on farms under practical conditions, both the serum inoculation and the simultaneous inoculation being employed at different times. In these practical experiments a number of hogs were generally left untreated, so that we might be sure that the herd actually had hog cholera and also be able to determine better the action of the serum. In these tests approximately 2,000 hogs, located on 47 separate farms, were treated. Some of the herds treated were apparently perfectly well at the time, but were in a neighborhood where hog cholera was prevalent. In other cases the disease was just beginning, as indicated by the sickness of one or two animals. In others the disease had progressed to a considerable extent, a number of the animals in the herd being sick at the time of treatment; and in still another class of herds the hogs had been exposed to disease by contact with sick animals, but had not developed symptoms of illness at the time of treatment. The tests were carried out under farm conditions, and aside from the serum injections no attempt was made to save the treated hogs. Upon summarizing the results at the end of the season it was found that more than 85 per cent of the treated hogs had been saved in herds that were sick at the time of treatment, while of the hogs left untreated in the same herds only 25 per cent survived; more than 95 per cent of the treated animals were saved in the herds which had been exposed at the time of treatment, while of the hogs in the same herds only 11 per cent survived; of the treated hogs in the lease herds only 15 per cent of the untreated hogs in the same herds only 15 per cent of the untreated hogs in the same herds only 15 per cent of the untreated hogs in the same herds only 15 per cent survived; of the treated hogs in the same herds only 15 per cent of the untreated hogs in the same herds only 15 per cent of the untreated hogs in the same he

While in practice the serum may not always give as good results as these, there can be no doubt that if used properly and in the early period of an outbreak of hog cholera it will effect a very large saving.

CONCLUSION.

these, there can be no doubt that if used properly and in the early period of an outbreak of hog cholera it will effect a very large saving.

CONCLUSION.

Since these results were obtained the department has brought this method of preventing hog cholera to the attention of the various State experiment stations and live-stock sanitary boards throughout the country and has proposed to them that they take up this work and prepare a serum for the benefit of hog raisers, as the preparation of serum by the Federal Government on a large enough scale to supply the needs of the entire country seemed to be impracticable. As a result of this, a number of the States have taken up the work, and in practically all cases where a thorough test has been made they have confirmed the results obtained by the department with this method. We therefore feel cafe in saying that this process will prevent log cholera, provided due care is given to the preparation of the serum and to its application.

The serum preparation is of such a nature that it should not be undertaken by farmers themselves, but should be under the control of trained men who have had experience in bacteriology and who are also thoroughly familiar with the diseases which affect hogs. For these reasons no attempt he-been made in this paper to describe the details of the serum production.

At the present time it is impossible to state definitely just what the cost of this serum should be. This will undoubtedly vary in different localities, depending upon local conditions, such as the price of hogs, the cost of feed, and similar minor considerations; but it has been estimated, and this estimate has been confirmed by at least one of the States now conducting this work, that the serum production this estimate will be materially reduced.

Finally, it should be remembered that this serum is to be used especially as a preventive, and that little success can be expected in herds which are badly affected with hog cholera. An early application is essential, and in the States w

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Pomerene], as he has said, has introduced a bill to appropriate $500,000 for this work. I introduced a bill, very early in the session, to appropriate $750,000 for it. Possibly $500,000 is as much as could be expected from Congress in these times of economy. We have introduced these bills now, without waiting for the Agricultural appropriation bill, because of the very thing the Senator from Ohio has so well suggested and I have so feebly suggested-that a dollar expended in the spring will be more effective than three or four dollars expended in July, and whatever is done should be done speedily.

It would seem rather a "penny penny-wise and pound-foolish" policy to refuse this appropriation on the ground that we must economize, and consequently permit the agricultural interests of the country to suffer. As the distinguished Senator from Ohio has suggested, we long ago reached the point in this country where the people regarded anything that detrimentally affected the agricultural interests of the country as affecting the entire people. We must be a great agricultural people or we shall not be a great people at all.

I have suggested before—and I know it is a somewhat delicate subject—that the money spent in sending out garden seeds for the last four years would have been sufficient to eradicate hog cholera in this country. It would seem more important to get rid of this scourge than it is to send out a few seeds that never were known to grow, anyhow, and are, in fact, merely political seeds, designed to reap a harvest of votes. I am glad the present Secretary of Agriculture has recommended practically the abolition of the free-seed practice.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly. Mr. JONES. I will suggest to the Senator that the present Secretary of Agriculture is not the first Secretary of Agriculture who has actually recommended it.

Mr. KENYON. The other Secretaries did not seem to have so much power as the present one; but now, if it shall be made a party matter, to be determined in caucus, I suppose we may get rid of the practice.

I shall be very much surprised if the present Mr. JONES. Secretary has the power the Senator thinks he has in another body that we do not dare mention here. I do not think there will be any difficulty in this body, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. KENYON. To the credit of this body be it said that they voted to strike the appropriation out of the last appropriation

Mr. JONES. Yes; and I think we were given some assurance here, were we not, when the bill was brought in in conference, that the matter was to be taken up rather so iously at this ses sion? That is my recollection. At all events, I hope that will be done

Mr. KENYON. As seriously as any free-seed matter can be taken up.

If we must practice economy, I want to appeal to our Democratic friends-and I believe in economy as much as they donot to practice it on this matter. We might practice it to some extent on the franking privilege; we might practice it by not printing so many things in the RECORD; we might get along with a few less public buildings and vote this money for a real purpose that is for the benefit of the entire Nation-to everyone who is compelled to buy and eat meat.

I hope the bill of the Senator from Ohio or some bill like it will be passed. I have to pride of opinion at all in the bill I have introduced. I shall be glad to see his bill passed. We of our State are anxious for results. I shall cordially cooperate in any movement that will furnish liberal funds to the Government, so that it may cooperate with the States in fighting this plague.

It is not merely a question of the Northern States. If it were, I am sure our southern friends would help us; but they are suffering likewise. We have never hesitated to vote large sums of money where there was a great public necessity. As I have said, millions have been spent in eradicating the boll weevil and the Texas tick. In times of distress from overflow of water we have always been generous in voting liberal appropriations. Those were more or less the South's calamities. This is partly their calamity, and to a larger extent our calamity in the North, but it is really a calamity of the American people.

The American hog has been described as the mortgage raiser, which is true. He has been compelled to go out of that business for the last few years and has been hurried to his reward entirely too fast. We are only asking now that Congress help to restore him to the proud position he once occupied-that of the mortgage raiser of the American farm and the prosperity producer of the American farmer.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator finishes I should like to ask him a question, with his permission.

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.
Mr. SMOOT. I have before me the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], calling for an appropriation of $500,000 for the purpose of providing and administering remedies for hog cholera. Does the Senator believe the bill ought to provide for administering remedies for hog cholera or that it ought to provide simply the remedy itself?

Mr. KENYON. If we could provide a remedy, I should like to see it done. That is a great question.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the approp

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the appropriation is asked for. Mr. KENYON. I think what the Senator from Ohio has in mind is the sending out of agents for demonstration work, as has been done by the Government, to instruct the farmer as to the treatment, and to instruct the State veterinarians, so that they may properly use the serum, and matters of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill specifically provides for administering the remedies. I thought that was rather uncalled for, because if the Government furnished the serum to each of the States the State itself, through its agencies, could administer the remedy.

Mr. KENYON. That is true, if the State officers are properly instructed by those who are familiar with the work. I will say to the Senator that in Dallas County they secured their serum from the State agricultural college. They could not secure enough of it, although finally the State agricultural college gave them the preference. The Government's special agents were there demonstrating among the farmers. They went right around among the farmers, where there were 20,000 sick hogs, showing how the serum should be used and instructing the farmers That was the work the Government did there. It had general charge. That is what is intended-merely to bring about cooperation, the Government doing part of the work, the State doing its part, and the farmer doing his part.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KENYON. I do. Mr. WARREN. I assume the idea of the Senator from Iowa in his measure is to carry this appropriation into effect some-thing like the appropriation for the destruction of the boll weevil has been carried into effect and executed. That is, the Government sends out demonstrators, not only to assist in the demonstration of the remedy for the boll weevil, but to instruct the planter as to the season, how to plant the crop, and how to raise it. While I am not engaged in the cotton business, I understand that has been very effective.

Mr. KENYON. In other words, to make farm demonstra-

Mr. WARREN. As I understand from the evidence that was given last year in regard to hog cholera before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the remedy is a very expensive one, and must be most carefully administered; but it seems that the care of the herd, the burning of the bodies of the hogs that die, and all that, is something of which the farmers generally are ignorant, and in which they need some instruc-tion. I assume that is what is intended by this bill, and I think the object is a worthy one.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?
Mr. KENYON. I do.
Mr. POMERENE. The primary object of the bill is to get Federal aid for the purpose of eradicating this disease. I take it that if the appropriation can be used in whotever way the It that if the appropriation can be used in whatever way the Agricultural Department may deem most efficacious, under any restraints that Congress in its wisdom may see fit to impose, there will not be any difficulty in determining the method in which it should be done. I think the Federal authorities should act in conjunction with the State authorities, and I have no doubt they will do so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa, whether an appropriation ever has been made before for purposes of this character?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; last year $40,000 was appropriated in an appropriation bill. The Senator from Iowa and myself tried to have the amount increased to $100,000, and the Senate voted the increase, but in conference it was reduced to $75,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That was to be expended under the direction of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. POMERENE. It was to be expended, as I now remember, under the direction of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BURTON. I have the provision before me, Mr. Presi-It is on page 5 of the agricultural appropriation bill. After the general appropriation for inspection, quarantine work, and so forth, it says:

Provided, That of this sum not less than $75,000 shall be set aside for demonstrating the best method of preventing and eradicating hog

So the appropriation was not less than $75,000 out of a total appropriation of $654,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will suggest to the Senator that I believe the wording of the proviso in the agricultural appropriation bill is very much better and more comprehensive than the wording of this bill. I think that covers the situation exactly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator is not after wording. He

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended. I have a great mass of details that I have not gone into, some of which I should like to put in the Record and some not. I ask permission, as an appendix to my remarks, to insert some of this matter. I shall not insert a great deal of it, but I should like to insert such as may seem proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

APPENDIX.

Ames, Iowa, December 19, 1913.

Senator William S. Kenyon,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Kenyon: I have your kind letter of December 15 and am sorry that I have been unable to get any more reports on herds vaccinated with our own serum. I believe, however, that those that are inclosed will give you a representative list, and I would not anticipate much change in the average if the list were larger. I desire to say also that these figures are not selected in any way, but all of the reports on the use of our own serum which we have been able to receive thus far have been included.

You will notice that the loss in the healthy herds treated by the combined serum and virus method was close to 2 per cent, and if two herds were excluded, in which the administration was not strictly according to our directions, the percentage of loss after treatment would be very much less. To my mind these two columns of figures speak volumes in favor of the treatment and also emphasize the importance of careful supervision of this work in the field. You will notice also that the results of the serum alone and the serum-and-virus method in diseased herds show a loss following the use of the serum-virus method which is much smaller than by the serum alone method.

I am taking the liberty to inclose a report made by Dr. Dorset, in Chicago, in regard to the work that is being done in the States of Indiana, Missouri, and Iowa. No doubt Dr. Dorset could give you additional valuable information.

Again referring to the inclosed table, I wish to call attention to the fact that only 16½ per cent, including sick hogs, were lost in diseased herds following application of the treatment. I believe that it is safe to estimate that without the treatment the losses in these same herds would have amounted to at least between 80 and 90 per cent, as the disease has been very virulent this year.

You may be interested to know that I am making arrangements with the State agricultural department to gather figures in regard to the prevalence of hog cholera in the State this year and the number of animals lost. I am sorry that we do not have these figures available at the present time. In addition to this, the college here is making a canvass of the losses in this State, and will see that a copy giving the results of this canvass is sent you at an early date.

If I can be of further assistance to you, I wish you would not hesitate to write me.

Very truly, yours,

C. H. Stange.

Washington, D. C., December 10, 1813.

Hon. W. S. Kenyon,
United States Senate.

Dear Senator Kenyon: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of December 6, 1913, in which you suggest the preparation by some of the experts in the department of a pamphlet of instructions to farmers relating to hog cholera.

It is believed that good results will be accomplished by issuing a separate publication dealing especially with methods of preventing the spread of hog cholera, and we have had in mind for some time the issuance of a pamphlet of this nature. The work of preparing the pamphlet will be begun immediately, and it is expected that it will be ready for distribution in the course of a month or so.

We now have a Farmers' Bulletin which deals with the subject of hog cholera in a popular way, a copy of which I am inclosing herewith. Very truly, yours,

B. T. Galloway,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. William S. Kenyon, United States Scrate, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Senator. We are very much pleased to learn that you are going to press consideration of the question of Federal cooperation in the stamping out of hog cholera. The losses from this disease in this section have been very great this fall, and yet they would have been vastly greater but for the serum we were able to obtain. When serum could be had the herds were saved in large part. Our greatest trouble was not obtaining the serum. The details of this are more fully set forth in the inclosed memorandum prepared by G. R. Bliss, our county agriculturist. Our Scott County organization recently issued the inclosed bulletin on this subject, and I am sure you will be interested in the good that was done with the serum treatment.

I thank you for what you say regarding my testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee. This appears in part 27 of the printed bearings, and the amendments suggested at that time have been practically unanimously approved by the "country" national banks in Iowa.

With kindest regards, we are,
Very truly, yours,

Davenport, Iowa, October 27, 1913.

Hon A. F. Dawson, Davenport, Iowa.

Dear Mr. Dawson: I was much interested in the letter which you showed me from Senator Kennon to the effect that he will introduce a bill calling for an appropriation of $1,000,000 to fight hog cholera. We have been seriously handicapped here all season by our inability to secure reliable serum. On several occasions I have had men with sick herds waiting on me as long as four or five days at a time, and I know positively many herds which could have been saved had we had good serum to give them when their owners first applied for it.

The whole problem of the treatment of pigs for cholera is an uncertain one and will be more or less unsatisfactory as long as we have to depend on private concerns for the supply of serum, due to the fact that the temptation to put it on the market even though a little weak and get the money from it is likely to prove stronger than human nature on the average can stand.

We have a good law in this State at the present time in regard to the strength and cleanliness of serum, but it is nearly impossible to enforce this law and convict firms guilty of selling weak serum because it is so difficult to prove that the serum was weak at the time it was sent from the factory. Another provision of the law, which is an excellent one, requires that serum be sent directly to the farmer who is going to have his hogs treated, who will pay for it at the express office when he takes it away. This law prevents overcharging to a large extent on the part of the veterinarian and takes the handling of the serum entirely out of his hands. This provision, however, it has been impossible to enforce this season because of the fact that an order put in for serum one day with any of our private firms would simply mean a telegram stating that it could not be sent at any time within three or four weeks. Hence it was absolutely necessary, in order to treat sick hogs when they should be treated, for a veterinarian to have a supply of serum on upon his demand the hog-cholera problem will very largely be solved. We will not have these bad results to record and it will then be comparatively easy to convince men of the value of the serum treatment.

While the State of Iowa, through the serum laboratory, has done excellent work this season and put out a large amount of serum, it has been utterly unable to cope with the situation, and the amount of serum put out has been absolutely insignificant as compared with the amount needed in the State. To my knowledge there has been no time since the serum laboratory was established that one could secure serum within three to four weeks after ordering.

I wish to express myself as very strongly in favor of this bill which Senator Kennon proposes to introduce. I think it is deplorable that the State of Iowa has not taken more vigorous action in the past to prevent the enormous losses which have been sustained. Each year during the past three these losses have aggregated millions of dollars, and could have been very largely prevented if we had been able to secure an adequate supply of reliable serum.

Sincerely, yours,

G. R. Bliss,

Report on serum for hog cholera.

THE SERUM TREATMENT WILL SAVE YOUR HOGS-WE OFFER THREE LINES OF PROOF.

THE SERUM TREATMENT WILL SAVE YOUR HOGS—WE OFFER THREE LINES OF PROOF.

First. The United States Department of Agriculture and practically every State in the Union has declared its value by the appropriations of Congress and the State legislatures, and by the bulletins of the various State agricultural and experiment stations.

Second. We have kept close watch on nearly 200 herds treated this season, the majority of which have been saved. Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, results in general have been good, and we can take the farmer who doubts to herd after herd where the cholera has been checked with little loss.

Third. We have placed well pigs which never had cholera but were given the double treatment in herds where cholera was raging and left them for several weeks without one of them becoming sick.

Last fall one such pig was placed in the sick herd of Charles Kruse. On January 1 three such pigs were taken from the Iowana Farms and placed in the herds of J. T. Hansen, Walter Koch, and Rudolph Koch. About August 1 three such pigs were taken from the farm of C. W. Lau and placed in the herds of William Murray, Carl Schaefer, and Henry Herman. About September 1 one such pig was taken from the herd of Lewis Sticher and placed in that of William Haines.

We have tested the serum treatment from every standpoint and found it to be the only sure preventive of the hog cholera.

We want to emphasize the following points:

1. Practically all the contagious disease among hogs in Scott County is hog cholera in some of its forms, varying from the acute or quick form to the chronic or slow form.

2. No cure for hog cholera has ever been found, and there is only one positive preventive—the serum treatment.

3. Some farmers may think they know how to keep hog cholera from their premises for years by certain methods of feeding, breeding, disinfecting, or sanitation, but we have seen dozens of such men finally overtaken by the disease. There is not any medicine or precaution of any kind, except the serum treatment, w

Many other so-called hog-cholera remedies have been tried, with results equally disappointing.

4. Hog cholera is no joke. The man who thinks he can let the disease run its course and save most of his hogs is generally doomed to disappointment. Natural and inherited immunity is all that will save him. He who saves over 15 per cent is fortunate above the average.

6. The success of the serum treatment depends upon the following factors: Strength and cleanliness of the serum, amount of disease in the herd, amount of natural immunity present, coolness of the weather, cleanliness of the premises, kinds of feed given, etc.

The three most important factors which determine life or death are all variable and almost impossible to control. They are the strength of the serum, the deadliness of the cholera germ, and the amount of natural or inherited immunity present.

7. A pig sick with cholera needs clean quarters, no dust, plenty of cool, clean water, fresh slop or milk, good pasture (clover or alifalfa is best), and no corn.

8. The symptoms of chronic cholera are as follows: Loss of appetite, conshing, hard breathing, constipation, and disposition to lie in sheds in the early stages. As the disease progresses the curl leaves the tail, the ears droop, the animal gets thin and weak, staggering as it walks, the eyeball is bloodshot and the eyelids often gummed up so that the pig acts as though blind. Sometimes the head is held to one side. In the last stages the bowels are very loose and the excrement green and watery. green and watery.

used when choiera is in the neighborhood. If one is reasonably sure that he has reliable serum, either the double or simultaneous method should be adopted. The former is safer if one isn't sure of his serum as there is always a danger of a loss from the simultaneous method. I. F. Gillmor lost 20 per cent by this method.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KENYON, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sermano Kenyon, D. C.

My Dear Sermano Kenyon: I returned to Ames yesterday after an official absence in the East. It was my great misfortune to be away from Ames when you called here, and to fail to find you in Washington before your return there. I am glad that you came to Ames, and hope you saw everything you were interested in, and I will be very glad to have you make any comments, suggestions, or criticisms to me of conditions as you found them.

I was very nicely entertained by your Mr. Rankin and want to express my appreciation of his kindness.

I wish I could have talked with you about the proposed legislation in the interest of hog-cholera eradication. It seems to me that if the United States Government is going into the business of producing hog-cholera serum, a very large amount of money will need to be provided. I am wondering if, with proper supervision, such as has been provided during the last year or so, and with enlargement of efforts in the States in the interest of serum manufacture, it will be necessary for the Government to undertake this phase of the work further than to give it a temporary impetus.

But I have no doubt as to the advisability of such demonstration or eradication work as is being done in Dallas County and in selected counties in two or three other States. I believe the Government can afford to spend a large amount of money in showing the practicability of keeping a considerable area free from the disease. The mistake should not be made, however, as was done last year, of holding the new appropriations until July 1. The money ought to become available early in the spring before the disease begins to spread. One dollar then is worth several later. While the manufacture of serum is very important, I am inclined to think that, with the limited amount of money the Government may spend along this line, the demonstration and eradication work is of greater importance, provided the Government makes serum for its own work or can arrange to buy it from State or private plants. private plants. Very truly, yours,

Senator W. S. Kenyon,

Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: I take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation to you for the bill you introduced, which will give aid to the farmers of the country in combating hog cholera. This bill will provide ample funds for the employment of county men to take the initiative in combating this dreaded disease.

I began the work as county agent in Wright County June 1. Since then I have devoted my entire time to the treatment of hog cholera and the educational work necessary to acquaint the farmers with facts concerning serum treatment. As a result of the work done in this county, we have in the neighborhood of 20,000 hogs that have been successfully immunized against cholera. Had reliable, tested serum been available at all times, we could have saved at least 10,000 more hogs.

The farmers of Wright County have supported this movement. Had I been able to enlist the services of four other men, there would have been pienty of work for all combating hog cholera. I have had the cooperation of five graduate veterinarians, which has helped greatly in taking care of the urgent demands for assistance.

The farmers of this county are financing this proposition without Government aid. I believe we have an application on file at Washington, D. C., for financial aid, which we are promised will be given as soon as funds are available.

I am sending you, under separate cover, a circular published by our department. This circular gives an outline of the different lines of work we are promoting.

Thanking you very much for the thoughtful effort you are putting forth for our great State of Iowa, I am,

Yours, very truly,

L. O. Wise,

Wright County Adviser.

Hon. W. S. Kenyon,

Washington, D. C.

My Dear Senator: Won't you kindly send me copy of your so-called hog-cholera bill, which I have seen mentioned several times in the papers?

Probably you know that the work against hog cholera is making good progress in Dallas County. Chief hindrance seems to be that the Federal people do not have enough serum. We have now offered to assist them by giving preference to requests for serum from Dallas County when approved by the Federal representative. But we are obliged to charge a small price for this serum, as we have no provision for free distribution. Our new plant is making an excellent start, and the serum already sent out has done great good. We are increasing the output.

Very truly, yours,

Hon, W. S. Kenyon,

Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: Knowing that you are deeply interested in the hog-cholera situation, as it stands now, and that you are trying to help the Government to solve the problem of combating this disease, and that you contemplate asking Congress to make a large appropriation to help in this matter, I am taking the liberty to address you upon this subject, hoping that you will pardon me for making this intrusion upon your time and that you will consider my suggestions given in a spirit of homesty and for the purpose, if possible, to help you get at facts. I send you, under separate cover, a little booklet containing a history of hog sickness back for half a century, a description of things I have seen and learned in my research against hog sickness. Please do me the kindness to note carefully facts which I have set forth in this little work I have spent my own time and money when making these investigations, and not the money of any State or Government. I have done this in the interest of science and for the good of my profession. I know, Senator, that the diagnosis, as made of this disease by the staff of the Bureau of Animal Industry, is not correct, neither is their remedy, and seven years of work on this line of attack has proven it is all wrong; and I am prepared to show that the vaccination of hogs with this serum treatment has killed thousands of well hogs on farms where no sickness or losses had occurred before. My little booklet will explain all this. I say, my booklet sells for Si.50. It makes no difference to me whether I sell a copy or not, and I am giving away hundreds of them; but I had it copyrighted, and in doing so I had to put a sale price upon it. Its object is to explain to hog raisers as to the cause and prevention of hog sickness. Now, in conclusion, Senator, let me say thousands of people, not in our own State alone but in other States, are watching with great interest if you make the move on this matter in the right direction. And I think you ought to proceed car

Hon. W. S. KENYON, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: Pardon me for again intruding upon your valuable time. I know that you are a very busy man, but I am so thoroughly aroused over the situation as to the hog sickness in our own and in other neghboring States that I can not refrain from writing you again. Since I last wrote you and sent you my little booklet I have not been idle as to studying the conditions, more especially here in our own State. I have written to and received letters from reliable parties in nearly half the counties in our State, and I find the conditions appalling in the sections where most serum has been used. There the losses have been greatest, and I, as well as other veterinarians and large numbers of hog raisers, are thoroughly convinced that the indiscriminate use of bad serum in the hands of young recently graduated veterinarians, who have settled in our State in the last two years, has been the means of spreading the disease into districts not before affected. Thus thousands of hogs have been made sick and disease has spread and multiplied until there is not a county in this State free from disease and death.

Thousands of well hags have been vaccinated and began to sicken and die immediately. This is no tide talk, Stenator. I have the names af this kind, and I know it is true. In my own county one man had 180 well hogs vaccinated and in 12 days 140 of them were dead. A neighbor had 79 well ones treated the same way and lost all but 12 in 14 days. This is only part of this kind of loss in this county. Around Keota hundreds have been killed the same way and lost all but 12 in 14 days. This is only part of this kind of loss in this county. Around Keota hundreds have been killed the same way. In Dallas County a man near Grimes had 160 well hogs vaccinates by a man called or using up the time previous. All but 5 died in a short time. In Mills County a man had nearly 300 treated. Nearly all of them died, and he has brought suit against the veterinary who treated them and the firm from whom he obtained the serum. The case is now pending in the district count of Mills County. [Special to Times-Republican.]

CLARION, January 13.

CLARION, January 13.

Of the four hundred or so farmers living on the six rural mail routes from this town, the names of those who escaped a visitation of hog cholera last summer and fall might be enumerated on the fingers of two hands. Practically every hog raiser had his experience with the disease. One man well posted on the matter estimates that one-fourth the usual supply at this time of year is left as the result of disease and close selling brought about because of it. In the neighboring town of Woolstock, it is said, a buyer collected a carload for shipment, but instead of going to a packing plant every animal of the load found its way into the pork barrel of a local farmer. Nearly everyone who was able to get serum vaccinated his hogs. Nearly everyone who vaccinated believes in the efficacy of the remedy, even though he lost most or all of his hogs, and it is a fact that the losses of hogs thus treated in the early part of the season were heavy. Fallure of the treatment to save the animals is generally attributed to inexperience in the work and to untested serum. Late season work done by a trained man and with tested serum produced almost universally favorable results, and many who lost large numbers of their animals this year declare they will administer the double treatment to the next crop at weaning time, confident that immunity will result.

It will not do, however, to state positively that it was vaccination that saved the hogs in every case. Several who did employ the method at all were able to save a greater or smaller part of their herds. One of these, who found sickness in his yard, "vaccinated" the three or four afflicted porkers with an ax, and proceeded to doctor the remaining ones with a remedy that he had heard was good, viz, red pepper. He fed up an even dollar's worth of the flery stuff, and up to last week he had not a sick hog on his place, a carload of the thriftiest kind of fellows being in his feed yards. Another man lost only one hog of a herd numbering about 90. A breeder of pure-bred hogs in another locality adopted a plan of his own. He made it a part of his chores to get out in the morning and "exercise" his hogs—ran them all over the pasture. At the same time he fenced off part of his cornfield and turned the hogs into it. He has just held a hog sale on his farm. Said one man: "I believe hog cholera might be prevented by keeping the stock in fresh yards and pastures, changing them every year or so." One thing is certain; there has been a lot of thinking on this subject of hog disease this year in this part of the country, and if next year's crop is lost it will not be because of carelessness or out-of-date methods on the part of the farmer.

COMPEL USE OF SERUM—COL. FRENCH, OF DAVENPORT, ADVOCATES COM-PULSORY INOCULATION OF HOGS—WANTS STATE TO EQUIP LABORATORY TO COST $250,000—SWINE BREEDERS, HE SAYS, SHOULD BE COMPELLED TO INOCULATE EVERY PIG WHEN OLD ENOUGH—BELIEVES DISEASE COULD THUS BE ERADICATED—OWNS HERD OF 1,000 AND NONE ARE LOST.

DAVENPORT, November 8.

Farmers and veterinary surgeons who have studied the ravages of hog cholera in lowa the past year estimate that the total loss will not be less than $15,000,000 and some place it as high as $25,000,000.

Col. George W. French, of Davenport, proprietor of the lowana stock farm, urges a compulsory system of inoculation, which he thinks will in a few years banish the disease from the State. He has 1,000 hogs, valued at $30,000, all of which have been inoculated with serum and not one has died from the disease. He wants the legislature to appropriate $250,000 for the purpose of establishing a serum factory large enough to produce sufficient serum to supply all the farmers of Iowa.

COMPULSORY INOCULATION.

He would then have the legislature pass a law making it compulsory upon farmers to inoculate every hog in the State, following this up by inoculating every pig as soon as it is old enough. In three or four generations of hogs, he thinks, the disease would be stamped out.

There has been much criticism of the last legislature because of the small amount appropriated to establish the serum factory at Ames. This plant produces hardly enough serum to treat the hogs of one county, to say nothing of the rest of the State.

KILL HOGS ONLY TO SAVE.

Despite the fact that 30 hogs are being sacrificed weekly at the Minnesota Agricultural College in Minneapolis to produce serum that other hogs may be made immune from cholera, which is still prevalent in western and southwestern counties of Minnesota, H. Preston Hoskins, assistant veterinarian, in charge of the serum department at the university farm, believes the loss to Minnesota farmers this year will be $5,000,000. He declared a large amount of the money would be spent for worthless medicines.

Enough serum can be obtained from one hog to inoculate 500 weighing 100 pounds each. In getting the serum hogs immune from cholera are used. Animals that have recovered from the disease or have been given the serum-virus treatment may be taken for the purpose.

These are rendered hyperimmune by being treated with virus made from other hogs. The blood of the hyperimmune animal has been found to contain a large amount of the substance that protects animals from attacks of cholera. From this blood the serum is made and sent to hog owners in all parts of the State to protect exposed herds.

LATE START MARS HOG-CHOLERA TESTS, BUT GOVERNMENT EXPERIMENTS AT ADEL SHOW VALUE OF WORK—DEMAND IS GROWING—FARMERS TAKING MORE INTEREST AND ARE AIDING EXPERTS.

ADEL, IOWA, October 14.

ADEL, IOWA, October 14.

The first year's results in the Government experiment to determine whether hog cholera can be controlled will not be what was anticlpated. But they will show that fully 80 per cent of the hogs of diseased herds can be saved if given the serum treatment. They also will show that few hogs are killed by the simultaneous treatment, which is the one given to prevent the disease.

The reason that the results of the experiment will not be entirely satisfactory is that the disease got ahead of the Government field corps which is working under the direction of Dr. O. B. Hess. The appropriation made by Congress was not available until July 1. By that date hog cholera was prevalent in many communities.

CHOLERA HAD GOOD START.

CHOLERA HAD GOOD START.

CHOLERA HAD GOOD START.

When it was announced the experiment was to be made it was said that only the preventive treatment would be given. The purpose was to demonstrate that cholera can be controlled by the use of virus and serum, not that it can be cured by the use of serum. But so many hogs were infected that it was found necessary to help save the sick ones.

Dr. James I. Gibson, State veterinarian, was in Dallas County to-day in conference with Dr. Hess. He is cooperating with the Government in the experiment. It is his duty to watch the sanitary end of the work. Quarantine regulations prevail on every farm where it is known that cholera exists or where the simultaneous treatment has been given.

"I am well satisfied with the results that are being obtained," Dr. Gibson said after spending a day in the field. "Dr. Hess and his assistants are doing their best to get the most out of the experiment. They certainly are doing a great thing for the farmers."

FARMERS ARE COOPERATING.

FARMERS ARE COOPERATING.

Ralph E. Joy, who is secretary of the county organization, reported to Dr. Gibson that the farmers are cooperating with the Government. There are a few stubborn ones who oppose the use of serum, but not "As an illustration of the interest the farmers are taking in the experiment, I might say that I am called over the telephone all hours of the day and night to send out field men to administer the serum," he said. "All I do is to try to gather data from the farmers that will help in the experiment. Letters have been sent to every farmer in the county."

Close to 8,000 hogs have been treated by the Government field men.

Close to 8,000 hogs have been treated by the Government field men. A majority of these were found to be diseased. From the reports prepared between 15 and 20 per cent of the diseased hogs have died. Few of the others succumb to the treatment.

REQUIRES BUT LITTLE TIME.

The field men have been in idleness half of the time. Recently near Dawson 457 hogs were treated in eight hours. The experts can administer serum to a hog a minute if they have the help needed.

At the home of W. H. Hathaway, 3 miles north of Redfield, 97 hogs were given the treatment in less than two hours. Twenty more were treated at the George Mullins farm, which is near by. All this was done after 3 o'clock.

Dr. Hess uses three assistants. The farmers are expected to furnish enough help to catch, hold, and prepare the hogs for treatment. Seven men are needed.

One of Dr. Hess's assistants takes the temperature of the hog.

If it is below 104 degrees, the simultaneous treatment is given.

Above that mark the hog is considered sick. He needs no virus. If the disease has not made too much progress the serum will cure him. TEMPERATURE DETERMINES AMOUNT.

From the temperature of the hog Dr. Hess determines the amount of serum to be administered. The size of the animal also plays a big part in determining this. One assistant prepares the serum and virus for injection. The third assistant keeps the records. If the temperature of a hog is found to be more than 106 degrees he is marked. This is done so that Dr. Hess may know whether many of those in the late stages of the disease are cured.

An idea of the work Dr. Hess has before him can be gained when it is known that he this afternoon refused to promise a farmer he could get to his herd in time to do any good. M. T. Pairdekooper, who lives near Hathaway, reported sickness in a herd of 150 head.

MUCH WORK AHEAD.

"I might promise you, but I won't because I know I can not keep it," Dr. Hess said. He called attention to herds aggregating 2,000 head in which there is sickness.

Dr. Hess advises the farmers to hire their hogs treated rather than to wait for the Government men The expense is about $1 each. The Government makes no charge. Some of the farmers hesitate because one or two incompetent veterinarians have administered the treatment in the county.

At their conference Dr. Gibson and Dr. Hess were unable to reach a conclusion as to what causes the disease to spread as rapidly as it does. Pairdekooper declared that no cholera had existed on his farm since he has lived there—for five years. Not a strange hog has been on the place during the summer. Two weeks ago, however, he drove a carload of hogs to market. Diseased hogs had been put in the stockyards. Dr. Hess said that Pairdekooper may have carried germs home on his clothes.

Three farmers got cholera in their herds by hauling hegs to a shipping place where cholera was prevalent. The wagons and horses carried the germs to the swine pens, Dr. Hess said.

Dr. Hess and Dr. Gibson are sure that by getting an early start in the spring they will be able to control hog cholera in Dallas County next summer. But they don't want to wait until they are put on the defensive before they start fighting.

PEPRY, IOWA, October 24.

PERRY, IOWA, October 24.

Drastic mesures to prevent the spread of hog cholera were adopted yesterday when several State officials started a tour of the county to place in quarantine every herd of hogs exposed to cholera.

Dr. James I. Gibson, State veterinarian; Dr. J. W. Bauman, of Bloomfield, member of the State animal health board; Dr. Hess, a Government expert in charge of the work in this county; and Henry Brady, member of the legislature, composed a party of men who left here this morning on a tour of the county.

They are posting notices and doing everything possible to prevent the spread of the disease. The quarantine notices lead:

"Parties having business on these premises must keep away from the hog lots. Parties occupying these premises are forbidden to go in or near their neighbors' hog lots."

According to the State and Federal authorities, Dallas County has more hog cholera this year than ever before in its history. Federal aid was given some time ago, and Dr. Hess and his assistants have been working for weeks to prevent the disease. In many instances they have been very successful, but in others they were notified too late to save the herds and confined their efforts to rendering immune the hogs on the neighboring farms.

They have been handicapped by being unable to secure serum when it was most needed, and conditions are such now that the most drastic measures are necessary to stamp out the disease.

SERUM PLANT SATISFACTORY—LEGISLATORS' ONLY REGRET IS THAT PLANT IS NOT LARGER.

[Special to Times-Republican.]

DES MOINES, January 10.

Des Monnes, January 10.

Members of the legislature have been well pleased with the State hog-serum plant in operation at Ames as provided for by the legislature. Several members have taken occasion to visit it during the short-course period at the college.

Speaker Cunningham, who was in the city yesterday, had just come from the college. "The serum plant is all right," he said, "only we have got to make it very much larger in order to do the business. I never saw a plant where they have everything in such excellent condition. And they have the records, too, of every shipment and can show exactly what results were obtained in every case."

Representatives Huntley, of Lucas, and Brady, of Dallas, also in the city this week, spoke in praise of the work being done.

"I have made a thorough investigation of the serum plant at the college," said Senator Ames, of Tama, who led in the fight for its establishment. "The only mistake we made was in not giving enough money. They should be able right now, at the dull time, to be making vast quantities of the serum to be kept for use when needed. It looks like the farmers will have to come to their help by buying in advance and putting up the meney. But it is a great institution and everything simply perfect. I went through the laboratories at Kansas City, and in contrast that at Ames is a delight. I am absolutely sure of the value of the plant and the work being done."

PROF. G. R. BLISS ON HOG CHOLERA—IOWA AGRICULTURAL EXPERT ADVISES
ILLINOIS FARMERS—APPLIES UNIQUE METHODS—WAGERS THAT HOGS PROPERLY TREATED WILL NOT GET CHOLERA FROM DISEASED ANIMALS.

MONMOUTH, December 11.

G. R. Bliss, county agricultural advisor of Scott County, Iowa, in which Davenport is located, is not a betting man, but he made a wager of $100 cold cash at the Mercer County Farmers' Institute meeting yesterday afternoon that if all the hogs of Mercer and Warren Counties were inoculated with fresh hog-cholera serum just after they are weaned, using the double treatment, that not one of the porkers would die, even though placed in a herd of diseased hogs. Mr. Bliss made the same bet with farmers of Scott County when cholera was killing off the hogs by the hundreds in that county a year ago, and he still retains possession of his original bank account—and more.

THE FOLLOWING PLAN FOR DEMONSTRATING THE BEST METHODS OF CONTROLLING HOG CHOLERA HAS BEEN SUGGESTED BY THE BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

METHOD OF PROCEDURE. I .- Educational work.

To be carried out jointly by Federal and State officials through lectures and demonstrations before farmers' clubs and special assemblages.

II.—Restrictive regulations and quarantine.

Restrictive regulations should be issued by State authorities and enforced by State officers and United States employees deputized for the purpose.

III .- Immunisation with serum.

This work is to be under control of employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and serum is to be administered at such places and in such manner as they may decide to be necessary.

IV.—Serum production.

Anti-hog-cholera serum sufficient for the work to be prepared by the Bureau of Animal Industry and furnished to the United States field inspectors upon request.

I .- Administrative.

The general administration of the work to be under the general direction of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture.

II .- United States Department of Agriculture.

(a) Field force.

One supervising field inspector and adviser. The force in each State is to be an independent unit reporting direct to the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry and is to consist of:
One inspector in charge.
One or more veterinary inspectors and one clerk.
(b) Laboratory force.
One inspector in charge with the necessary scientific assistants, clerks, and laborers to prepare sufficient serum to supply the various field inspectors.

III .- Nondepartmental.

(a) State officials.
As many trained employees as the State can furnish for field work and lectures.
(b) Volunteer assistants.
As many intelligent farmers as can be secured for general cooperation, to be chosen jointly by the United States field inspectors in charge and authorized State representatives.

COOPERATION.

Generally the following principles are to be observed:

1. The preparation and application of serum will be under control of Federal officials.

2. Necessary quarantine and other restrictive measures to be under control of the proper State officials.

3. Educational work to be carried out jointly by Federal, State and county representatives.

SENATOR FEOM MARYLAND.

Mr. KERN. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to call Mr. KERN. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to call up Senate resolution 247, referring to the election of Hon. Blair Lee as Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana

yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURTON. While we are on the subject of hog-cholera remedies, I should like to address the Senate briefly, not more than 10 minutes, before another topic is taken up.

Mr. KERN. I have agreed to yield a similar length of time to the Senator from Missouri, and if the remarks of the two Senators can be compressed within 30 minutes I have no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that I am not going to ask the Senator to give me 20 minutes or 10 minutes. I merely wish time to say now that this subject is a very important one, and I wish to record myself as being in favor of some measure like that which is now proposed. It is one of the most important questions before the industrial world at the present time.

Mr. KERN. The question I have brought up is a matter of the highest privilege. I desire to be courteous to all Senators. I am willing to agree to yield the floor, first, to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed], if I may do so, and I am willing to yield it further to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Burton].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President— The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KERN. I do. Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Do I understand that the Senator is having this privileged matter placed before the Senate for its consideration at the present time?

Mr. KERN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator whether there is a minority report upon this case?

Mr. KERN. There is a minority report, which was filed some time ago and which has been printed and is on the desks of Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I notice that some members of the committee are not present, and the Senate is far from having a full attendance. It seems to me that this matter ought not to be considered in the absence of Senators who joined in the minority report.

Mr. KERN. I will say to the Senator that I had intended to suggest the absence of a quorum after having called up the matter and before it was proceeded with. I had not yet made that

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he will not yield a part of the afternoon for the consideration of Order of Business No. 130, being resolution 241, introduced by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane], directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to conduct an examination to ascertain whether facts or evidence exist justifying the Government in instituting proceedings for recovery of fines, and so forth, from the United States Steel Corporation, its subsidiaries, or any common carrier because of unlawful rebates within the last six years?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President-

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say in this connection that I have been seeking an opportunity to bring up this report since it was considered by the Interstate Commerce Committee, but I was prevented by the pendency of the Alaska bill. It should be determined of course at an early date, and I suggest in the present condition of the public business, after getting his matter before the Senate, that the Senator from Indiana yield for the present consideration of resolution 241.

Mr. KERN. I think that resolution may be taken up tomorrow. There will be periods of time, I dare say, in which Senators will not be prepared to proceed on the election matter, and it may then be temporarily laid aside. Probably resolution 241 could be taken up this afternoon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Nevada to the fact that on January 17 I gave notice that immediately upon the close of the Alaska bill I would ask the attention of the Senate to Senate bill 3091, being the bill for agricultural extension work. I would regret very much to lose the position which that bill occupies before the Senate.

I recognize, of course, that the matter the Senator from Indiana brings to the attention of the Senate is a matter of the highest privilege, and I take it for granted that all other questions would be displaced before the question of seating a Senator; but I would very much like this afternoon to call up Senate bill 3091 and then temporarily lay it aside, not intending in any manner to keep it in the way of the matter of privilege which the Senator from Indiana has in charge.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I do not desire to encounter any parliamentary entanglement in regard to the matter I have in charge. I have no objection at all to any steps being taken by the Senator from Georgia with reference to his bill, with which I am in entire sympathy, that would not in any way interfere with the continuous consideration of the Maryland election case until it is disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the bill under the notice I have given is taken up this evening, I shall at once ask to lay it temporarily aside and I will continue to request that it be laid aside until the Senator from Indiana concludes his matter of the highest privilege.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Georgia that Senate resolution 241 is a matter involving an investigation that it is claimed is required immediately, with a view to litigation now pending between the United States and the Steel Trust and with a view to securing evidence that will be material in that case. I do not think it will take long to dispose of it, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane] has been pressing for its disposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask if that is not a matter which can come up in the morning hour?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If it were the understanding that it would come up in the morning hour to-morrow after the routine busi-Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Oregon?
Mr. LANE. Yes. ness, I would be very glad to have that disposition made of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move, then, that Senate resolution 241 be taken up immediately after the close of the morning business Mr. NEWLANDS. to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. That motion is out of order. The proper time to make the motion is to-morrow after the close of the morning business. Then, if the Senator makes the motion and the Senate decides to take up the resolution, of course it will be taken up.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator from Utah make that point of order?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President. Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish, by unanimous consent, to have the resolution disposed of to-morrow, if possible.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rule, of course, the Senator would have to call for a quorum before a request for unanimous consent could be submitted.

Mr. KERN. I have no doubt that ample opportunity will be given for the consideration of the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate take up Senate bill 3091. I make that motion in pursuance of the notice I gave the 17th of January, and I wish to state, in connection with making it, that after the bill has been taken up I shall ask to lay it aside temporarily.

withdraw his motion?

Mr. KERN. No; I can not withdraw my motion. Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana ield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will yield for one moment, give notice that to-morrow morning at the close of the routine business I shall move to take up Senate resolution 241, being the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KERN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire again to request the Senator from Indiana to allow me to present this motion. His resolution is a matter of the highest privilege. We can lay Senate bill 3091 aside after it has been taken up and proceed with the matter he has in charge. If I do not present this motion now I would in a measure lose the benefit for the bill of the notice gave about the middle of January.

Mr. KERN. I do not desire now to complicate the parliamentary status of the resolution I have brought up. entirely willing at the proper time to assent to the proposition of the Senator from Georgia. If he will defer it a little later, I think there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But unless the Senator allows me to do it now there will be no other proper time. I will state again, if the Senator will allow me to take up the bill at this time, I will at once ask that it be laid aside temporarily, so that the Senator from Indiana shall have the right of way, and I will not press the status of the bill until he finishes the matter that he has brought up for consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state that it is the object of the Senator from Georgia to make the bill the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely. Mr. BACON. That does not interfere with taking up a matter which has precedence.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The question of order is this: A matter of high privilege having been presented to the Senate, is it competent for the Senate then to put it aside for other

I do not think it can be set aside. Mr. KERN.

Mr. SMOOT. It can be done by unanimous consent. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think this would be true, Mr. President. If the Senator from Indiana insists upon pressing his resolution without allowing me first to make this motion, it will take precedence over my motion, and I will not undertake to press my motion except with the consent of the Senator from Indiana; but if he will allow me to make my motion, I will at once ask to lay aside the bill temporarily and the Senator from Indiana will again have the floor and will have the advantage he now has. The only thing that he will have done is that he will have permitted me to utilize my former notice to make Senate bill 3091 the unfinished business, to be displaced continuously until the Senator from Indiana completes the subjects that he desires to bring before the Senate.

Mr. KERN. I do not understand why the Senator from Georgia may not make that request at any time as well as now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For the reason that having given notice January 17 that I would make the motion immediately after the disposition of the Alaska bill, and having obtained the approval of a large number of Senators to give the matter this direction, while from a parliamentary standpoint, strictly speaking, I have no advantage, yet under the practice of the Senate I have a great advantage in forwarding the measure I wish to press before the Senate. My doing so will in no way inconvenience the Senator from Indiana, but I think I can do so only by his consent. It is for that reason that I ask his

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. KERN.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Georgia what effect the disposition of the matter as he suggests would have upon my notice to take up the resolution to-morrow morning at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would not affect it at all, Mr. President, because being the unfinished business it would not be called until 2 o'clock to-morrow, when I would again ask to lay it aside temporarily until the matters the Senator from Indiana is interested in are finished.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would the Senator also include in that guaranty or assurance the consideration of the Senate resolution regarding the Steel Trust, which ought to be disposed of?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand the question, the resolution will come up to-morrow morning after the routine business and before 2 o'clock. I have no disposition to interfere with it. I only want to obtain for my measure the status that I hope the notice I have given has secured for me.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I would do almost anything to accommodate my friend the Senator from Georgia, but having brought this matter before the Senate as one of the highest privilege, it is before the Senate. I do not see how I can do more than yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KERN. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I simply wanted to inquire what is the matter before the Senate. Is there a motion before the Senate

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is endeavoring to ascertain whether it can transact any business, the Chair under-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask whether the Senator from Indiana has made a motion to proceed to the consideration of

Mr. KERN. I called up Senate resolution 247 as a matter of the highest privilege.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I suggest, Mr. President, that it is a matter of the highest privilege, and having been called up, the Senate ought to proceed to the consideration of it. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate, if insisted upon. It has been delayed, the Chair will state to the Senator from Utah, owing to requests made by various Senators that the Senator from Indiana withdraw the demand. It being insisted upon, however, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 247, reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That BLAIR LEE was duly and legally elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland at a regular election held in that State on the 4th day of November, 1913, and that the said BLAIR LEE, having presented proper credentials from the State of Maryland, is now entitled to take the oath of office as a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the resolution. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to give notice that immediately upon the disposition of these contested-election cases, which are matters of the highest privilege, I shall bring to the attention of the Senate again Senate bill 3091.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that he would suggest the absence of a quorum, as there may be Senators interested in the pending resolution who are absent.

Mr. KERN. I had intended to make that suggestion myself. Mr. SMOOT. I did not make the suggestion. If the Senator does not make it, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst Hitchcock Hollis Smoot Sterling Stone Sutherland Overman Bacon Bankhead Page Pittman Ransdell Reed Robinson Saulsbury Shafroth Sheppard Shively Simmons James Johnson Jones Borah Bradley Swanson Thompson Townsend Vardaman Walsh Warren Brady Bristow Kenyon Kern Lane McCumber Martin, Va. Mr. BRYAN. My colleague [Mr. Fletcher] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] is unavoidably absent. I will make this announcement for the remainder of the day.

VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he intends to say anything in support of the resolution?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, this case has been thoroughly briefed by counsel on both sides. Some of the briefs have been on the desks of Senators for a week or two. The majority report and the views of the minority have been presented to the Senate and to Senators. As I have no particular message to deliver to my constituents on the subject or any general message to the people of the country, I do not think it would be profitable to occupy the time of the Senate in a further discussion of these questions, all of which have been discussed and all of which are fresh in the minds of Senators present.

Therefore I think it would be unprofitable to take the time of the Senate in an extended discussion of the questions here presented.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Indiana rather indicates that he not only does not desire to say anything in support of this resolution, but that he really has nothing to say in support of it. He tells us that the case has been thoroughly briefed upon both sides and that he thinks there is no necessity of discussing it. One of the most important questions in the case, as it seems to me, has neither been briefed upon the side of the proponent in any satisfactory way nor has it been treated in any satisfactory way in the report of the majority. I do not agree with the report of the majority in this case, and I desire very briefly to give my reasons to the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute? Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the resolution be read. I have not yet heard what it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The resolution has been read. I have no objection to its being read again, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the facts in this case very briefly stated are as follows: Senator Rayner was elected for a term which, if he had lived, would have expired March 4, 1917. In November, as I recall the date, 1912, Senator Rayner died, thereby leaving a vacancy in the representation from the State of Maryland. That happened prior to the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution.

The governor of the State of Maryland, acting under the old provision of the Constitution, which gave him authority during the recess of the legislature to fill vacancies by temporary appointment, appointed Senator Jackson to fill that vacancy.

The Legislature of Maryland next meeting after that appointment was the legislature which is now in session in that State and which met shortly after the beginning of this month. The legislature is still in session, and its session will terminate by constitutional limitation on the 7th day of April of this

Under the old provision of the Constitution the governor, in the case of a vacancy happening, is authorized to make a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature, which is then directed by the Constitution to fill the vacancy. So under the old provision of the Constitution there can be no question but that Senator Jackson was entitled to hold his seat until the happening of one of two things-either the election of his successor by the incoming Legislature of Maryland, which is now in session, or the adjournment of that legislature without an election.

Pending that event, however, the governor of Maryland last fall issued a writ calling for a special election to be held upon the day of the regular election prescribed by the laws of Maryland, at which election a successor to Senator Jackson, or to Senator Rayner, as you please, was to be chosen.

That state of the case brings up two questions: First, whether under the terms of the seventeenth amendment a special election could be held in the State of Maryland for the purpose of electing a United States Senator, and, second, if so, when would the person so elected take his seat in this body, or, in other words, when would the term of Senator Jackson expire so as to create a vacancy which could be filled by his successor thus elected:

Two contentions were made before the committee with reference to the power of the governor to call an election. First, that under the terms of the seventeenth amendment the governor was authorized to call an election without any legislative authority whatsoever, and, second, that if legislative authority were required that authority was to be found in the statutes of Maryland which had been adopted prior, and some of them long prior, to the ratification of the seventeenth amendment.

I have found myself unable to agree to either of those contentions. The report of the committee does not tell us which view the committee adopts.

All that is said in the report upon that subject is contained upon page 4, and reads as follows:

The seventeenth amendment required that the governor should issue his writ of election in case of the happening of a vacancy in the representation of his State. Such a vacancy had happened. The people under the provisions of the new amendment then in force had the right to elect. The only question to be considered was as to whether there was in existence appropriate election machinery for the expression of the popular will, and it was found that such machinery had been provided both for nomination and election. In other words, there was no obstacle in the way of an orderly and lawful election as contemplated by the seventeenth amendment.

That is all that is said by the committee upon that branch of the case. I am unable to determine from reading it whether it is the opinion of the majority of the committee that the seventeenth amendment itself is sufficient to authorize the election or whether legislation is necessary to carry out the provisions of the seventeenth amendment, and that that legislation exists in the statutes which have been heretofore enacted by the Legislature of Maryland. If the latter view is taken by the committee, the report is unfortunate in not setting forth some provision of the statutes of Maryland which would authorize that conclusion. I have read all the provisions of the election laws of that State that seem to have the remotest bearing upon the subject, and I have been unable to find any provision in the laws of that State which would authorize such an election as this. It would have been somewhat helpful to some of us if the committee had pointed out the provisions of the statutes relied upon, which we might then have taken up and considered.

Mr. President, with reference to the first contention that was made, I call the attention of the Senate to the language of the constitutional provision. Perhaps I had better read the entire seventeenth amendment in this connection. That amendment provides as follows:

ARTICLE XVII.

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

I call particular attention to this provision:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies—

I pause for the purpose of emphasizing the last provision that I have read. Then the amendment proceeds:

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

Now, I again emphasize the concluding paragraph of that amendment, which is as follows:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

It was claimed by those who presented the case before the Committee on Privileges and Elections on behalf of Mr. Lee that the provision of the seventeenth amendment to the effect that-carries with it, as an incident, the authority to condition the election. In other words, having authorized the governor of the State to issue a writ of election, by implication that carries with it to the governor authority to fix the time when the election shall be held, the places where it shall be held, and the manner in which it shall be held, or, in other words, to provide, in issuing the writ of election, for every necessary element of the election element of the election.

If this provision had been the only provision upon this subject in the Constitution, there would have been some foundation for that claim; but it is not the only provision in the Constitu-tion upon that subject. The old provision of the Constitution, which is to the effect that the legislature shall fix the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, still remains intact. That is a general provision. It is contained in section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, and reads as follows:

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or after such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It will be observed, therefore, that the power is conferred upon the legislature, in the broadest possible terms, that the legislature shall prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives-not general elections, not special elections, but all elections. I can not imagine how it would be possible in language to confer that power upon anybody in express words any more strongly or broadly.

It follows, therefore, if we are to construe this language as it plainly reads, that the people who framed the Constitution devolved upon the legislatures of the various States the authority to fix the times, the places, and the manner of holding all elections for Senators and Representatives. There is no qualification; there is no language in the Constitution anywhere else conferring that power upon the governor; but it is, in effect, said that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Constitution giving this power without qualification to the legislature, the same power rests in the governor by mere implication. In that connection, let me again call attention to the words of the seventeenth amendment.

There is no authority to fix the time or the place or the manner of the election, but simply to issue the writ of electiona mere ministerial act-which must have a legislative foundation for it before the power can properly be exercised; in other words, in the case of a special election the powers are divided. To the legislature the power is given to legislate with reference . to the times, the places, and the manner of election, while to the governor is given the power to issue a writ of election, calling for the election to be held.

Of course, in the case of a special election a precise day upon which the election should be held could not be fixed, but it could be fixed, nevertheless, by prescribing that it should be held only after 30 days' notice or 60 days' notice, or some provision of that kind; and certainly, with reference to the manner and the places, those elements are as capable of exact description by the legislature in the case of a special election as they would be in the case of a general election. If the governor has the power to fix the time as an incident to this authority to issue a writ of election, he must, of course, have the power to fix the places and the manner as well, because each of those elements is equally necessary to an election.

Then we are confronted with this situation: If the governor has this authority, he, from the very nature of the case, could not fix these elements by a general rule; he must announce them in each case as the case arises, because they are to be fixed; he has no power to legislate, only in connection with his issuance of the writ of election. So, in one case he may call an election 2 days after the notice is issued, in another case in 60 days, and in another case in 6 months. Then, with reference to the places, he may say in one case that the election shall be held in the several polling places provided for by State law, in the various voting precincts into which the State is divided;

in the next case that arises he may provide that the polling places shall be the county seats. Indeed, if he has the power, it is a full power, and he may go further and provide in the next case that arises that the votes shall all be cast at the State capital.

Coming to the question of the manner, he may in one place prescribe the Australian ballot; in another place he may prescribe some other form of voting. So, instead of having some definite and certain rule, the whole matter of these elections would be in the unrestricted discretion of the governor of the State. It seems to me that no such intention can be found by the language of the Constitution to have been in the minds of its framers.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. STONE. There is a provision in the amendment to the effect that, where a vacancy occurs, the governor of the State shall issue a writ of election. Like provisions appear, I think I may safely say, in the constitutions of all the States with reference to State officers. That is common in the constitutional law of the States, and the provision that is common to the constitutional law of the States is now incorporated in this amendment to the Federal Constitution, in substance and effect. When the governor issues his writ of election, complying with this provision of the Constitution, to whom is the writ issued? Is it issued to the sheriff of the county or to some other official of the county directing that an election be held? A writ must be directed to some official. It is an official act by the governor, to be carried out as an official act by some subordinate or some officer to whom the writ is addressed. If it be addressed, for example, to the sheriff or to some other county official or officials throughout the State, what does it command them to do? To hold an election for a certain purpose. Would the governor not necessarily state in the writ when the election should be held? To hold an election on a certain day for a certain purpose. That fixes in the writ, it seems to me, the time when and the places where the election must be held.

As to the manner, that settles itself, because the statutes of every State must provide the manner in which special as well as general elections shall be held—the places, the precincts where they shall be held, how they shall be held, and how the returns shall be made and to whom.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Where are those elements fixed?

They are fixed in the statutes of the State. Mr. STONE. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Where are they in the statutes of Maryland?

Mr. STONE. I assume they are in the statutes of Maryland, as in those of other States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, the Senator assumes something-Mr. STONE. Yes; I assume—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And perhaps the committee assumes; but I ask the Senator, as I have asked the committee, to put his finger upon the statute which does that. The difficulty

Mr. STONE. I confess very frankly that I have not examined the statutes of Maryland at all; but I think I might well make that assumption, for it would be strange, indeed, if one could not assume that every State in this Union would make provision for the times, places, and manner of holding elections within its sovereign borders.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it is not strange at allindeed, it would be strange if the contrary existed—that no State has fixed the times, the places, and the manner of electing United States Senators by the people, because until the seventeenth amendment was adopted there was no provision for the election of Senators by the people.

Mr. STONE. I am not speaking of United States Senators; I am speaking of elections.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, does the Senator think that the provisions of a statute authorizing the people to elect a governor on a particular day authorize them to elect a Senator upon that day?

Mr. STONE. I assume, Mr. President, that the statute of the State provides when, where, and how any and all elections shall be held within the State, and how the returns shall be computed and tabulated and the result declared.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am going to take up that question and discuss it a little later, and if the Senator will do me the honor to listen to me, I think I shall show that there is no such provision in the statutes of Maryland. But that is not the question which I am now discussing. The matter I am now discussing is the contention which is made that no statute at all is required; that the power exists in the governor by implication; that it follows from the provisions of the seventeenth amendment giving him the right to issue a writ of election; and that no other authority is needed than that provision in the Constitution. That is the question I am now discussing. The question which the Senator from Missouri suggests I will discuss in a moment.

In connection with that subject there is a very important provision in section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, namely, that-The Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that a State might entirely fail to act upon this subject, in which event the power exists in Congress, in the very language of the provision, "to make * * * such regulations." What reguprovision, "to make such regulations." Those regulations which by the preceding paragraph lations? the legislature had been authorized to prescribe. If they fail to prescribe the regulations, then Congress may make them. But that was not deemed sufficient, and the further provision was added that Congress may "alter such regulations," con-templating that, although the legislature might act, it might act unwisely and Congress might desire to make an alteration in their legislation.

I call attention to that for the purpose of showing that the framers of the Constitution considered it of the utmost necessity that the supervisory power of Congress over all elections, general as well as special, should be retained. If the construction which the proponents of this resolution, or some of them at any rate, insist upon is to be followed, then no supervisory power exists in Congress with reference to any regulation made by the governor of a State. If it flows from his power to issue a writ of election, then there is no provision in the Constitution which will enable Congress to supervise that power. He may act very unwisely, in the opinion of Congress, and yet Congress has no power to interfere. Can it be possible, when it was considered to be so important to preserve the power to alter regulations made by the legislature, that the power to alter regulations made by the governor should be denied? Mr. REED. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think it follows because a power to act is reserved to Congress, and Congress Goes not act and a State sees fit to proceed, that if the State's act is recognized, it must be upon the hypothesis that Congress has

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not quite catch the Senator's

Mr. REED. Well, I understood the Senater to be arguing that if we were to seat a man in the Senate who had been elected by the people under a call issued by the governor, in the absence of any statute of the United States, such a recognition by the Senate of the election would be tantamount to a declaration that Congress had no power to legislate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the case of a special election-Mr. REED. Now, I ask does the Senator think that follows?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do think it follows.

Mr. REED. Is not this the case: The Constitution has reserved to Congress a superior power, which it may exercise, but if it fails to exercise that power, the State may then proceed, and the fact that the State's act is recognized as legitimate means no more than that the State has the power until Congress sees fit to exercise it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am afraid that I have not made myself quite clear to the Senator from Missouri. What I am arguing is that the Constitution, in section 4, Article I, evidences that the framers of the Constitution considered it of the utmost importance that the supervisory power of Congress over the legislation of the States respecting elections should be preserved, because the Government of the United States, to a certain extent, is dependent for its very existence upon the election of Representatives and Senators, and, therefore, they have reserved to Congress the power to deal with the subject if the State fails to deal with it or if it deals with it in a way that Congress does not approve. Section 4, Article I, of the Constitution confers upon the legislature the power to fix the times, places, and manner, and the limitation as to the power of Congress is to be confined to those regulations which the legislature may prescribe; but if we construe the seventeenth amendment, which authorizes the governor to issue a writ of election, as carrying with it an incidental power upon the part of the governor to fix the times, the places, and the manner, then the supervisory power which the framers of the Constitution thought was so necessary to give to Congress in the case of legislation upon that subject is denied to Congress in the case where the governor is required to act. I say it never could have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that that condition would exist.

Mr. REED, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think that is the way I understood the Senator before. He appears to argue that because certain rights have been reserved to Congress which it might exercise, but which it has not exercised, if the State then proceeds, in the absence of legislation by Congress, and we recognize the State's act, that is a denial of the right of Congress to act. On the contrary, it seems to me, if the Senator will pardon the interruption, when Congress has reserved to itself a right which it has not seen fit to exercise, if a State then proceeds to hold an election in such a manner as is satisfactory to it, and if the man elected is here seated in the Senate, that is not at all a negation of the right of Congress, because Congress has failed to legislate; but Congress might to-morrow legislate, and if it did legislate, then a different question would be presented. were to seat a man not elected in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress we would be denying the right of Congress to act; but until the Congress does act the State may proceed without at all negativing the power of Congress under the Constitution to act. Indeed, I think, if the Senator will bear with me, that for many years there was no Federal statute with reference to the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Senators. Each State elected in its own way, always, of course, through its legislature. Afterwards we fixed a day when the balloting should begin. But prior to the passage of that law is it not true that the legislatures proceeded in their own way, and that the men selected by them as Senators were I may not understand the Senator, but if I do it seems seated? to me that the conclusion he reaches is not correct,
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not talking about a case where Congress has failed to act, nor a case where there is legislation in the State upon the subject. I am simply in sisting that if the seventeenth amendment is to receive the construction which the proponents of this resolution claim for it, then we have denied all power to Congress, all opportunity for it to act, whether it pleases to act or not, upon the subject of a special election, because if the governor has authority in connection with the issuance of the writ, and fixes the time and the place and the manner, we have not in that instance reserved to Congress the power to act at all. Of course, in the case of the legislature, it may not act, but the essential thing is that it has the power to act if it pleases.

I undertake to say that under our system of Government such a thing as a voluntary election is an unimaginable thing. There have been instances in some of the States where the people have gotten together and held an election; that has happened several times; but the courts have always held that such a pretended election was without any force or validity and that there must be legislative foundation for an election.

In framing the Constitution it was recognized that a legis lative foundation must exist before an election could be held. So its framers directed in this broad and comprehensive way that the legislature of the State should fix the time and the places and the manner of holding elections. The language is mandatory that those elements shall be prescribed in each simply say that that general provision, conferring upon the legislature the authority to provide for the election of Senators and Representatives, of necessity denies the power to anybody To say that a power shall be exercised by one person is equivalent to saying, unless there be some limitation in the provision, that it shall not be exercised by anybody else.

Therefore it seems to me there is no foundation for the claim that the governor had the authority to fix the conditions of this election. They must have been prescribed by the statute.

That brings me to the second question, as to whether or not there is any statute of Maryland or of Congress which prescribes these elements of an election.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. KENYON. Before the Senator passes from the first proposition, I will state that I do not want to agree with the Senator if I can help it, because I feel—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not like the Senator to interrogate me in that frame of mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENYON. I feel that in the case of a man who comes here with credentials from the people, every doubt ought to be resolved in his favor. Referring to this language, "The times, places, and manner of holding elections," in the case of a special election the governor does regulate the time, does he not, in all the States; and, if that is true, could it not be assumed that that is not to apply, by virtue of the seventeenth amendment, in the case of a special election?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. The time, as I stated a moment

I heard the statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The time could not be fixed in the sense that a day would be fixed for it, but the time for doing a thing may be fixed within limits; that is, it may be provided that an election shall be called within a certain number of

Mr. KENYON. I know that nearly every State has some provision for that, but the governor does in fact fix the time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He fixes it within the legislative limitation

Mr. KENYON. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For example-I am not quoting any particular statute, because I do not remember any, but I am using this simply as an illustration—the legislature might provide that within 30 days after the happening of the vacancy the governor should call an election, and should give notice not less than 30 nor more than 60 days after the issuance of it. would fix the time; but without some such provision as that in the legislation my contention is that the governor has not any power to act, because the power has been devolved upon the legislature.

Mr. KENYON. I understood the Senator's position, I think. It is very hard to answer, and I shall not undertake to answer it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest that in that case, just as much as in the case when the time is fixed, there is legislative foundation for the holding of the election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes; there is legislative foundation for it, undoubtedly.

Now I come to the second question. That is as to whether there is any legislative foundation for the election.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa that all doubts ought to resolved in favor of the right of this applicant to his seat. So far as I have been informed, and as I believe, the election in Maryland was an absolutely fair election. I think notice was given as sufficient as anybody would want or as any legislature would have required. The election was participated in by the people of the State generally, and Mr. Lee was fairly elected.
Mr. SMITH of Maryland. All parties taking part.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. All parties taking part, and he was elected if there was any legislative foundation for the election. But, Mr. President, this is a Government of laws. If I am correct in saying that an election is a void thing unless there is legislative foundation for it, if we seat a man here, however fairly he was elected, without that legislation, however much we may justify ourselves in our own consciences, we have nevertheless done a lawless thing.

The whole question here is whether or not there was warrant of law for holding this election. We can all imagine elections called by anybody in a State to fill some office that would be held under all of the forms of orderly procedure, that would be fair in every respect, and yet that would be held by the courts to be absolutely void because there was no legislative foundation for them.

There must be a law for doing things in this country, and my contention is that however fair the election was there was no legislative foundation for it in this case, and therefore it is

As I said in the beginning, it is unfortunate that we have not had pointed out to us the legislation upon this subject. I have gone somewhat carefully over the election laws of Maryland. There are provisions in the constitution of Maryland for the election of various officers, naming them; for the election of a governor upon a particular day; for the election of other persons who are named in the constitution upon particular days. There is in the statutes of Maryland provision for the election of other officers upon particular days. There is provision in the statutes of Maryland for the election of the mayor of Baltimore City upon a certain day named; for the election of Representatives in Congress upon a certain day named in the statute; for the election of electors of President and Vice President of the United States upon a day named. Then there are general provisions in the statutes of Maryland designating the various election officials, prescribing their duties, the form of ballot, and the various things surrounding the election.

So far as I am able to read these statutes, however, there is no provision which in terms provides for the election by the people of a United States Senator, nor any statute from which that authority can be implied. On the contrary, not only is there an absence of any affirmative statute with reference to it, but there is a statute in the State of Maryland providing for the primary nomination of United States Senators and their election by the legislature.

Therefore, the action of the Legislature of Maryland in providing for an election by the people with reference to these other officers, and then enacting an express statute which says that United States Senators shall be nominated by the people at the polls, and that that nomination shall be certified to the legislature, and directing them to proceed in accordance with it, is a clear recognition upon the part of the legislature that it was not providing for the election of United States Senators by the people. We are undertaking to read into these statutes something which we are unable to find there, something which the legislature clearly did not intend to be there, and something which is negatived by other affirmative provisions of the statutes.

It is said, however, that there is a general provision in the statutes of Maryland which defines the word "election," and that provision is as follows:

The word "election," as used in this article, shall be construed to include elections had within any county or city for the purpose of enabling voters to choose some public officer or officers under the laws of this State or of the United States.

That is a very common provision in statutes, a provision which is generally called an interpretation clause. In many of the statutes which contain an interpretation clause there is, in express language, a limitation upon it that the words shall receive the interpretation prescribed by the statute unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense. That, however, is only the legislative declaration of a well-settled statutory rule in the absence of legislation.

The words defined in an interpretation clause are given the general meaning which is prescribed in it wherever you find phrase, provided that there is nothing in the or the use of the words where you find them that clearly indicates another intention on the part of the legislature. Otherwise we might by a provision of that kind interpret a word to mean a certain thing when it was used in a statute which expressly declared that it meant something else; but, in accordance with the well-settled statutory rule, the particular provision which shows the meaning of the phrase overcomes the general provision in the interpretation clause. That has been settled by a multitude of cases.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether, in these statutes providing for elections and fixing their time, the officers to be elected at those elections are specifically named?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So far as I have been able to find, they are specifically named in every instance.

Mr. WORKS. There is no general statute providing for elections independently?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no general statute providing for the election of officers generally.

Mr. President-Mr. CUMMINS. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah vield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be that the Senator from Utah intends to deal later with the phase of the matter which has most interested me. If so, when I mention it, he can say so, and I shall not press my inquiry.

I think the argument of the Senator from Utah upon the first point he has brought to the attention of the Senate is unanswerable, but I should like to hear his view upon this phase of the matter:

The governor of Maryland has a legal adviser, I assume. is the attorney general. When this vacancy occurred-and we must presume that there is a vacancy, in order to make the argument of the Senator from Utah pertinent at all—he in good faith asked his legal adviser-that is, the legal adviser of the State of Maryland-whether he had legislative authority to issue a writ of election and submit to the voters of Maryland the choice of a Senator. The attorney general in good faith, I assume, advised the governor of Maryland that there did exist in the laws of Maryland authority for the issuance of a writ of election and for the holding of an election for a Senator of the United States. The governor, in good faith, I assume, accepted that interpretation of the law of Maryland and issued his writ of election. The people, without challenge, in good faith, accepted that interpretation of the law and participated in the election

With these facts-all of which are admitted, I believe-is not the law of Maryland, so far as we are concerned, the law as given to the governor by the attorney general? Are we now at liberty-I know we have the power-but are we at liberty to reverse the decision of the attorney general of Maryland, upon which the governor in good faith acted and upon which the people in good faith acted, and put upon those laws or that law another and different construction after the event has occurred?

To me, as far as I am concerned, without any inquiry into the laws of Maryland, I feel that, with the interpretation that has been given to those laws and the act of the people which I must accept that construction in determining whether or not this applicant is entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from Utah upon that point before he concludes. It may be that he had it in mind to address himself to it. If so, I shall not ask him to interrupt his argument; but if he had not deemed it necessary to look at that phase of the matter, I hope he will do so, in view of my suggestion, before he finishes.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I think the proposition stated by the Senator from Iowa is absolutely true, from what I know of the matter in Maryland.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not my answer will satisfy the Senator from Iowa, but to my mind it is absolutely conclusive. There is a rule, which the Senator no doubt has in mind, that the construction of the State courts as to the meaning of their statutes and their constitutions will be followed by the Federal courts. In this case, however, the Constitution of the United States provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and so forth. Being made by those express terms of the Constitution the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, it is the sole judge. We can not abdicate any part of that power to the State courts, the Federal courts, or any of the State officers.

When a man comes into this body presenting credentials from the governor of his State and his election is challenged, it is the duty and responsibility of this body to inquire whether or not he has been properly elected. In order to discharge that responsibility, the first inquiry to make is whether there is legislative foundation for the election. The Senate can not be bound by what some attorney general says, to the effect that there is legislative foundation for it, if we find there is not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, there is no doubt about our power. It is absolute; it is unreviewable; it is unreversible. I am only speaking of what we ought to do.

I put this question to the Senator from Utah:

Suppose the Supreme Court of the State of Maryland had been called upon to construe its laws, and had held, as the attorney general held, that the governor had authority to issue his writ of election and to require the election to be held as it was held. Or, take one step further: Suppose in some way the Supreme Court of the United States had its jurisdiction invoked, and it had held that the law of Maryland gave to the governor the power that is here in dispute. Of course we would not be bound; that is, we would have power to ignore the decision of the Supreme Court of Maryland; we would have power to ignore or repudiate the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I ask the Senator from Utah, however, whether, in the performance of our public duties, it would not be very fitting for us to accept the construction which had been put upon the law of this State by these high tribunals? If he agrees with me with regard to that, I ask him whether, so far as we are concerned, there is any difference between the good-faith interpretation of the law by the attorney general and the goodfaith act of the governor upon it and an interpretation that may have been put upon it by a court either of a State or of the

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, of course, the Senate ought to give most respectful consideration to the view of the attorney general of Maryland, to the view of the Supreme Court of Maryland, if it had passed upon the question, and to the view of the Supreme Court of the United States; but, it being our duty and our responsibility to judge of the election—and the very use of the word "judge" implies the exercise of the judicial function in the matter-we must judge of it. We can simply consider the opinion of somebody else as persuasive and not as controlling.

I have no objection to considering the opinion of the attorney general as persuasive. I have considered it, but I have been unable to find in the opinion of the attorney general anything that would justify me in coming to the same conclusion to which he came, and I must follow my own view of it and not

Mr. WORKS

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California? Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I started to ask the Senator from Utah whether the attorney general of Maryland pointed out the particular statute under which he advised the governor he might call the election?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is some time since I read the opinion, but I do not recall that he did. I was going to call attention to the statute which has been relied upon. I have for-It is some time since I read the opin-I have forgotten for the moment whether he or somebody else called attention to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may supplement that by saying that I have examined the opinion, and he does point out more than one statute specifically. Whether he is right or wrong is a different matter; but he does point out, with great particularity, the foundation for the opinion he gives the governor.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest that it is not only within the power of the Senate to determine the qualifications of one who presents himself here asking to be admitted as a Member of this body, but the positive duty rests upon us to determine whether or not he has been legally elected, and we can not shift that responsibility to somebody else.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator is clearly right.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator will allow me a moment longer, I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from California, if we carry that doctrine to its legitimate conclusion the Senate will find itself in the near future a returning board or a canvassing board for the votes of the people in the If a man were to come here, an applicant for a seat in the Senate, alleging that he had been elected by the people of a State, and the fact of his election and the number of votes he had received had been certified to by returning boards and canvassing boards and finally by the supreme court of a State or the courts of the United States, I for one should not feel that I ought to enter upon the work of counting the ballots. I should feel like accepting the conclusions of these bodies which had been appointed by the law to determine these facts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may find himself, before we get through with this business, in that very situation. is a new departure, with reference to the election of United States Senators by the people, and the Senate has not been troubled with matters of that sort in the past; but when I was a Member of the House of Representatives I happened to be a member of the Committee on Elections there and heard a number of contested-election cases; the ballot boxes were brought before us and we canvassed the returns to determine whether the man had obtained his seat by a majority of votes or not, and necessarily when we are made the judges of elections we are the judges of every element in the election, and because the task is a hard one it none the less belongs to us.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of our power. We can turn out a man who is plainly entitled to his seat. We have the power to do it. It is only a question of the procedure that we should adopt in exercising that power. I think before we have gone far we will have reached the conclusion that we must take somebody's word for something in the process of the enforcement or the execution of this law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is all very true; we shall have to take somebody's word for something; but when we get a contested-election case we will have to determine whose word we will take.

I was discussing the provision to which attention had been directed, namely, the general-interpretation clause, and I had stated the character of the statute of Maryland upon this subject. I will not stop to repeat it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it does not interrupt the

Senator

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Missouri, Mr. REED. He is making a very interesting, lawyer-like gument. The Senator takes the position that there must be express legislative authority for an election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not necessarily express.

Mr. REED. Well, express or implied from some statute. should like simply to get the Senator's view upon this proposi-when vacancies happen in the representation of any State the governor of the State shall issue writs of election. express, absolute, and unqualified command, directed to the governor, and is the authority of the Constitution of the United States to the governor to issue his writ of election to elect an officer of the United States, for, whatever others may think, I believe a Senator of the United States is an officer of the United States.

Now, following that clause, which is an express command, is a clause directing when and how the legislature of the State

Provided-

I quote

That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

So you have here, first, an express authority and command directed to the governor by the Constitution itself to issue writs of election. Then you have that followed by a clause which provides that the legislature may act if it sees fit, and may, if it ees fit, empower the governor to appoint.

Taking the two clauses together, does not the Senator think that the Constitution of the United States furnishes abundant authority to the governor to issue his writ of election? I want to add to that whether the authority to issue a writ of election does not embrace within it the power to fix the time and the place of the election in the absence of some express inhibition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I thought I had discussed that question at some length. The Senator calls attention to the provision of the seventeenth amendment authorizing the governor to issue a writ of election and says that is a command. But it is only a part of the command. The command of the Constitution is that preliminary to the exercise of that power by the governor the legislative foundation for it must be laid by the legislature. In other words, the general provision of the Constitution is that the time, place, and manner of all elections—I interpolate the word "all"—of elections shall be prescribed by the legislature. Now, that is a part of the command. Another part of the command is that in case of vacancies in that particular class of elections the governor shall issue a writ of election. But, nevertheless, the legislature must have fixed the manner in which the election the governor calls shall be held and the places at which it shall be held and, as far as the legislative power can definitely deal with it, the time.

Mr. REED. When the Constitution declares that the legislature shall fix the time and place and manner of election it refers to the election of a Senator, does it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; both Senators and Representa-

Yes: Senators and Representatives. It covers What has the Senator to say to those cases which have been decided here in Congress where the governor of the State issued his writ of election without any express legislative authority at all and an election was held and a Member of Congress was seated?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have two answers to make. The Senator says those cases. I recall only one case in which it was expressly held, and that is the Hoge case, which was decided in the very early years of the Government, I think in 1801. In that case the governor did issue a writ of election, and the Election Committee of the House reported by a majority, as a majority of this committee has reported, that the Member who had been elected was entitled to his seat. That was antagonized by a minority. I think the argument, the reason, and the logic were altogether with the minority. I think the majority in that case decided wrongly, as the majority in this case have decided wrongly. But, in addition to that, we do not know whether that was the precise ground upon which the decision proceeded or not. Until within the last day or two, having read the debates over with some care again, I was inclined to think that the decision did proceed upon that ground, and I so stated in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but I find when I come to carefully go over the debates again that it was claimed on the part of some of those who insisted that the applicant should be seated that there was legislative foundation for it, and they pointed to some statute. But, how-ever that may be, I think if the Hoge case proceeded upon the ground that the governor had the incidental right to fix the time and place and manner, the Hoge decision was wrong. not recall any case that has specifically followed it since. There may have been some.

Now, Mr. President, let me proceed with reference to the conlike simply to get the Senator's view upon this proposi-The seventeenth amendment expressly provides that cases is an English case, the case of the Dean of Ely against Bliss, reported in one of the English reports which I have cited in these views. The court said:

There has been a great deal of discussion, which I am not surprised at, in regard to the meaning of the words; but it is to be observed that although the meaning of the words is defined by the statute, yet that statute declares (what would have been supplied if it had not been so expressed) that the words are not to have that meaning attached to them in the interpretation clause if a contrary intention appears.

I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to read all the authorities which are set forth in our printed views, but I do pause to call attention to the general statement by Wilberforce, an English writer, on the subject of statutory construction, and he is a very careful writer upon that subject. He

The real purpose of an interpretation clause is to define the meaning of words when nothing else in the act is opposed to the particular sense which is thus placed upon them.

In 2 Sutherland's Statutory Construction, an American work, section 359, some English cases are cited to the effect that the statutory interpretation clause "could be satisfied by applying it to the word where there was nothing in the context to in-terpret it otherwise," and that the clause "should control where the words occur without being accompanied by any others tending to show their meaning; or to interpret words which are ambiguous or equivocal, and not so as to disturb the meaning of such as are plain." And again, in section 360, the same author

On the other hand, general statutory definitions and rules of interpretation will apply when the statute in question is not plain; or, in other words, does not define and interpret itself. Where positive provisions are at variance with the definitions it contains, the latter, it seems, must be construed as modified by the clear intent of the former, on the principle that the special controls the general.

There are a number of cases to that same effect.

This interpretation clause provides that where the word "election" occurs it shall be construed in a certain way, but we find the word "election" used in connection with Representatives in Congress. Can it be said that the word "election," used to qualify the way in which the Representative in Congress shall be chosen, by this interpretation clause shall be extended to include a Senator as well?

We have many interpretation clauses which provide that words in one gender shall be interpreted to include the other, and yet if in the course of a statute we should provide for drafting men into the Army it would not be held that the term "men" there included "women," notwithstanding the broad provisions of the interpretation clause. The interpretation clause simply governs the interpretation where there is nothing in the statute, where we find the words, which indicates that it was intended to be used in another sense. So it seems to me that the interpretation clause which is in the Maryland statute does not in any manner help the case.

Now, Mr. President, I pass to the final question which I shall discuss, and I shall be very brief about it. I think when Senator Jackson was appointed by the governor to a seat in this body he had a term the same as anybody else. It is true it was not a term which expired upon a particular day as does the term of a Senator who has been elected for a full term; but it was a term, nevertheless, which ended upon the happening of an event instead of the happening of a period of time. The constitutional provision which authorizes the governor to appoint is as follows:

If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make tem-porary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Now, what is the meaning of the phrase "until the next meeting of the legislature"? What does it qualify? It must qualify something.

"The executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature." There is no comma after the word appointments, but there is a comma after the word "legislature," and that comma is followed by the phrase "which shall then fill such vacancies." It seems to me obviously the phrase "until the next meeting of the legislature" qualifies the power of the governor to appoint and not the length of term which his appointee shall hold.

Until the next meeting of the legislature the governor may act. When the legislature meets the power of the governor to act is ended.

The Constitution contemplated that there should be two authorities to choose Senators. The primary authority was the legislature, which acted under ordinary circumstances. But the legislature could not act when it was in recess, as it is in most of the States the larger part of the time. So to obviate a continuing vacancy in office or the calling of special sessions of the legislature, the Constitution devolved the secondary power upon the governor to appoint; but it is a secondary power, nevertheless; and that secondary power it was contemplated by the Constitution should end whenever the primary power became capable of acting; and when the legislature met the primary authority then became capable of acting, and the governor's secondary authority to make the appointment ceased.

So the governor, acting upon this authority, during the recess appointed Mr. Jackson. Then the question arises, How long does he hold? There is no provision in the Constitution which precisely states that, but the provision is, speaking of the legis-"which shall then fill such vacancies." Of course the legislature, under the statute which has been passed, can not act immediately. It must begin the second Tuesday after it convenes, and it must have time to determine the question. It may not determine it in a single day, but the direction is, and that is in peremptory language, that the legislature shall then fill such vacancy. It has the whole length of the session within which to discharge that duty. The governor having made his appointment at the time when he was authorized to make it, his appointee holds until the legislature has acted, if it act at all; but it may not act at all; it may adjourn without acting. In that event the mandatory terms of the Constitution have not been complied with. The legislature of the State has deprived the State, by its failure to act, of a Senator; and by all the cases that, so far as I know, have been passed upon in this body it has been held that the term of the appointee of the governor ends in any event when the legislature adjourns. Now, the provision of the seventeenth amendment is:

It is true the seventeenth amendment provides for the election of a Senator by the people, but this clause steps in and, in effect, says that that provision for the election of a Senator by the people shall not be operative to deprive any sitting Member of his sent until the end of the term for which he was chosen prior to the adoption of this amendment. It saves his seat to him.

The inquiry, then, is, What was the term of Senator Jackson before the seventeenth amendment was adopted? And to determine that we must go to the old provisions of the Constitution, and those provisions are clear that he would have held until the happening of one or the other of these two events-either the election of a successor by the legislature or their adjournment without an election.

By the seventeenth amendment, however, the power of the legislature to act has been taken away, so that one of these events can never happen; but the other will happen. So we find the term, under the old provision of the Constitution, is limited by the happening of the one event, namely, the final adjournment of the legislature without election. Unless we give it that construction, we have no certainty whatever in the provision.

It was contended at one time that Senator Jackson's term would expire immediately upon the ratification of the amendment. That was abandoned, and it was claimed that it would expire immediately upon the election of his successor. But he still holds; he is still here, and it must now be claimed that he holds until his successor is seated. It seems to me very clear in any event, if the election be valid, Mr. Lez is not entitled to take his seat until Senator Jackson's term expires, which will not be until the legislature adjourns. That, I understand, under the provision of the constitution, will not be until the 7th day of April.
Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.
Mr. POMERENE. As I understand the facts, the attorney general of Maryland gave the opinion that it was proper to call a special election or to vote for a United States Senator at a general election; that thereupon the governor of Maryland is-sued his proclamation for the election of a United States Senator; and that the voters of the State of Maryland all participated in this election; and I assume, Mr. President, that the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. Jackson] participated in that election, at least to the extent of voting at the election. Am I correct in that?

Does the Senator think that that Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

constitutes an estoppel in pais?

Mr. POMERENE. Not of itself, perhaps; but when you have everybody who is interested in the election participating in it it seems to me that it goes a long way toward minimizing any claim that the junior Senator from Maryland might have on the seat.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, it may go a long way toward minimizing that, but it does not quite reach the point of curing the entire absence of any legislative authority for the election. The Senator, I think, must agree with me that there is not any such thing and can be no such thing as a voluntary election. There must somewhere be legislative auvoluntary election. There must somewhere be legislative authority, of course, before any election can be held under our form of government

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

The second part of the Senator's argument Mr. KENYON. is the one with which I have the least difficulty in disagreeing, but it is pretty difficulty to disagree with the first part.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am glad the Senator finds it easy to agree in some respect.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it is not so easy; but I desire to ask the Senator if he has given consideration-and I suppose he has-to the case brought by Mr. Wellington, who was the Progressive nominee for the Senate, and who was refused a place on the ballot? An action of mandamus was brought against the secretary of state of Maryland to compel him to place Mr. Wellington's name on the ballot.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not familiar with that case

Mr. KENYON. It is a very late decision. The court dismissed the petition and held that the order of the lower court permitting the writ to issue should be reversed. The appellate court of Maryland indicated in the opinion how Mr. Wellington's name could have been placed on the ballot under section 51 of article 33, which is the section providing for elections in that State. So that it seems to me fair to say that the appellate court of Maryland has taken the position that the laws of Maryland are sufficient for the election of United States Senators by the people in indicating how Mr. Wellington, as the Progressive nominee, could have his name placed on the ballot for the election in November.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My attention has not been called to

Mr. KENYON. I understand the Senator in any event does not concede the proposition advanced by my colleague as to the conclusive effect of the decision of the court; but it is conceded that it is persuasive.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undoubtedly so, as the decision of any court is persuasive or the decision of any law officer of good reputation and ability is persuasive.

Mr. KENYON. It is a little more than that; it is the construction of the law of the State by the attorney general and by the highest court of the State, which is, of course, more per-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa must, it seems to me, concede that under the provisions of our Constitution the Senate of the United States is, in the last analysis, the sole judge of the election and qualifications of its Members.

Mr. KENYON. Of course.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That being so, if it has the right to judge of the election, it has the right and the authority and the duty to judge of every element in the election, and that includes the law as well as the facts of the election.

Mr. KENYON. It has that right and that power; but it seems to me the fact that not only the attorney general of Maryland but the appellate court of Maryland have practically held that the election laws of Maryland are sufficient to place on the ballot the name of a candidate is somewhat persuasive if not conclusive

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know whether or not the case to which the Senator calls attention involved the question of the validity of the law, but I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he can now point me to any provision of the Maryland statutes which he thinks authorizes an election by the people of a United States Senator?

Mr. KENYON. A specific provision-no, I can not. I fall back

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, a general provision?

Mr. KENYON. I fall back on the general provision the Senator has been discussing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The interpretation clause?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that the word "election" shall cover officers elected under the laws of the State or of the United States

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, the Senator simply postpones the difficulty. Where does he find in the laws of Maryland, outside of that interpretation clause, any provision which is not accompanied by such language as to indicate clearly that it was not intended to cover the case of a United States Senator?

Mr. KENYON. The illustration which the Senator has given as to the mayor of Baltimore and the election of a Senator by the legislature I am familiar with, and I listened to that with a good deal of interest; but I can not see that that lends any weight to his argument, because United States Senators, of course, were not in the contemplation of the framers of the laws of Maryland when they passed these acts; but there might be State offices which were subsequently created and which were not within the purview of the framers of the laws at the time, but, out of an abundance of caution, they may have gone so far as to cover any offices that in the future might be created by the State or under the laws of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Supreme Court has said, and many other courts have repeatedly said, that it is the intention of the legislature which is the law. Now, the Senator seems to concede that it can not have been within the intendment of the Maryland Legislature in passing the law to include United States

Mr. KENYON. To include a specific office; but it might have been their intention to include all officers for whom the people might thereafter vote, which would be sufficient.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, Mr. President, any inference of that kind is overcome by the fact that the Maryland Legislature at the same time provided a specific method for the election of United States Senators, and provided that they should be named by the people and should be elected by the legislature.

Mr. KENYON. Exactly; because that was itself the provision of the Constitution, and they could not provide any other way

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It could not have been intended by any language which they used to include the election of a United States Senator by the people when, in the same statute, they provide for his election in another way.

Mr. KENYON. Not the particular office, I grant that; but the intention may have been that all officers for whom the people might thereafter vote should come under the title of "Elections."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In any event, it seems that the Senator's position is that in order to arrive at that conclusion we must do violence to the real intention of the legislature.

Mr. KENYON. No; not at all; but we must try to interpret the action of the legislature so as to carry out the will of the people as expressed by the election. That is what I want to do. Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would be glad to find any provision in the statutes which would justify that conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah takes his seat I should like to ask him one more question. Suppose there had been in Maryland two statutes applicable to elections; that there were no question but that one or the other of them was applicable to the election of a Senator, one of them requiring a notice of 60 days and the other requiring a notice of 70 days, and the question being in doubt, the governor of Maryland submitted the matter to the attorney general of that State; that the attorney general advised him that the statute which required but 60 days' notice was applicable; that the governor thereupon gave 60 days' notice and the people assented to it, participated in the election without any remonstrance or protest, and the election was held, does the Senator from Utah think, as an original proposition, that the Senate, in considering the credentials of a person elected at such an election, ought to reverse the opinion of the attorney general, the adviser of the governor? Does he not think, the opinion having been acted upon and having become part of the procedure of the State, there being no fraud, everything being in good faith, that the Senate ought to accept that construction of the law and seat the person thus honestly and in good faith elected?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That would depend upon whether or not the Senate was willing to discharge its responsibility in strict accordance with the Constitution, or whether it was inclined to shirk its responsibility and take the judgment of somebody else. If the question were a fairly debatable one, and the attorney general had held in that way, I for one would be very much inclined to follow his judgment; but I can imagine a case where I would not. Suppose, for example, that one of the statutes to which the Senator calls attention, providing for 60 days' notice, was passed 10 years ago and the other statute providing for 70 days' notice was passed 2 years ago, then it would be perfectly clear that the later statute would control; and I would not accept the opinion of the attorney general that the earlier statute controlled in that case, no matter what the consequences might be. If, however, it were a matter that was fairly debatable, as I have said, his judgment about it would be persuasive, and it would be sufficiently persuasive in that case to induce me to follow it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President— Mr. KERN. I ask that the pending resolution before the Senate, being Senate resolution 247, be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

CORRECTION OF THE BILL H. R. 11269.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I find that on last Saturday in the bill (H. R. 11269) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, on page 12, line 8, the dollar mark was inadvertently omitted from the print. I ask unanimous consent that in enrolling the bill it may be corrected.

The SPEAKER. To put in the dollar mark?
Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; to put in the dollar mark before the figures "12."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

ABATEMENT OF HOUSES OF ILL FAME.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under the rules, this being District day, I call up Senate bill 234, generally known as the "red-light" bill, and ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Johnson] calls up Senate bill 234, of which the Clerk will report the

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 234) to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose; and to assess a tax against the person maintaining said nuisance and against the building and owner thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky has a number of bills on the Union Calendar. If it is intended to call those up, why not go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on District bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in view of the contemplated objection, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Johnson] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District bills. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District bills, with Mr. CLARK of Florida in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole

House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up for consideration Senate bill 234.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In such action the court, or a judge in vacation, shall, upon the presentation of a petition therefor alleging that the nuisance complained of exists, allow a temporary writ of injunction, without bond, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court or judge by evidence in the form of affidavits, depositions, oral testimony, or otherwise, as the complainant may elect, unless the court or judge by previous order shall have directed the form and manner in which it shall be presented. Three days' notice, in writing, shall be given the defendant of the hearing of the application, and if then continued at his instance the writ as prayed shall be granted as a matter of course. The assessment of said tax shall be made by the assessor of the District of Columbia and shall be made within three months from the date of the granting of the permanent injunction. In case the assessor fails or neglects to make said assessment the same shall be made by the chief of police, and a return of said tax shall not relieve the person or building from any other penalties provided by law. The provisions of the law relating to the collection and distribution of taxes upon personal and real

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Sherley having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 48. An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of

ABATEMENT OF HOUSES OF ILL FAME.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], the chairman of the subcommittee that had the bill in charge

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Cara-

WAY] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, this measure under consideration is designed, as its caption discloses, "to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same, and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose; and to assess a tax against the person maintaining said nuisance and against the building and owner thereof." It is proposed to accomplish this result by declaring the places occupied a public nuisance. This is to reach not only the building but the land upon which it stands, the contents of the building, and the owner of the property, as well as the user. It gives to the citizen the right to institute proceedings, if the public officials shall fail in their duty, and makes the general reputation of the place and its occupants evidence sufficient to procure an injunction against its maintenance. It levies upon the owner of the house a tax, besides closing the premises for occupancy for at least one year for any purpose whatever, unless the court shall, in its discretion, release it. It protects innocent people against unjust attack by assessing the costs of the procedure against the complainant if the evidence falls to sustain the charge. Its enactment into law and the enforcement of the law renders public prostitution impossible within the territory embraced in the act.

Ordinarily, measures like this dealing with moral issues are fought out as if questions of morals and nothing else were involved. The argument interposed against proposed laws of this kind is one of impracticability, the opponents contending that such measures are incapable of being enforced; that they have never been a success—in other words, that you can not legis-late morals into peoples or communities; that regulation and segregation are the only successful means to deal with this issue; that to undertake to suppress public prostitution will be to scatter the inmates of houses of this kind into all sections of the city, and thereby contaminate all communities. Many profess to believe this. Perhaps a few do honestly believe it. Most profess to believe it, however, because in their heart of hearts they are unwilling to exterminate vice of this kind. If they really could be assured the result flowing from the enactment of the law would be what they profess to fear it will, these opponents would become the warmest champions of its passage, because the result they predicted is the result they wish to exist. Of course, this is not true of all persons who oppose the passage of measures of this kind, but it certainly is true of many. To those who honestly believe that a law of this kind can not be successfully enforced, the facts developed in the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, having this measure in charge, would be of particular interest. To those who oppose it because they fear its results may be what its friends claim, no arguments could reach, nor reasons convince.

Happily for us who champion its passage, the merits of this measure do not rest altogether upon its moral issues, however important and convincing they may be. But there is an economical side to the proposed law, and the result to be accomplished by its enactment from that standpoint alone would more than justify its passage. According to the best statistics obtainable, there are engaged in prostitution throughout continental United States more than 250,000 girls. This number includes only those who are openly engaged in such a business and who reside in houses of prostitution and assignation. The statistics further show that the average life of a girl in this business is five years; so to keep the number engaged thus in prostitution up to 250,000 it requires an annual drawing into this hideous business of 50,000 girls.

It is further claimed by statistics that the life of a woman is worth to the Nation at large, as a producer of wealth, $5,000.

If, then, every normal woman contributes to the national wealth during the course of her lifetime so large a sum, it becomes apparent that, considered from the standpoint of wealth alone, the loss to the Nation would be $12,500,000 annually, because no one would contend that a prostitute adds anything to the wealth of the community in which she may reside or to the Nation at large. But greater still is the loss, because attendant upon houses of this kind are hangers-on, pimps, and white slavers. It is fair to presume that every girl in prostitution supports, directly or indirectly, five other persons engaged in debauching and corrupting her and the public morals. These also have ceased to be contributors to the national wealth, but are parasites upon society, and, therefore, from the side of economics alone the passage of this law becomes a necessity, leaving out the overwhelming appeal made to our public conscience in behalf of the morals and honor of the Nation.

Again, all students of government will agree that the brothel and the saloon are the chief breeding places of crime. If these two institutions were closed, we would have but slight need for criminal courts, and our criminals statutes might almost safely be repealed, and thus turn back into the Public Treasury to enrich and endow institutions for the uplifting of society instead of corrupting and destroying a third of all the revenues now collected for all purposes in all States of the Union.

Turning again to the moral side of the issue, houses of prostitution can not exist without inmates, and inmates can not be procured without invading homes. Homes can not be invaded without destroying the happiness, reputation, and usefulness not only of the member taken, but all that are left. falls not more certainly upon the one who enters the house of prostitution as its inmate and its slave than upon those that are left, even to the third generation. There is no misfortune that can fall so heavily upon a family as to have the stain of immorality rest upon some member of it, and yet to recruit these 50,000 girls that are to be yearly sacrificed to this Moloch of crime requires the taking of 1 member out of every 350 homes throughout the length and breadth of this land, or, counting all those who are engaged in public prostitution, 1 member out of every 72 families who reside beneath our flag.

Further, in order that houses of prostitution may be conducted there must not only be inmates, but there must be pa-The cadets, hangers-on, pimps, the people with power and influence to protect, and the more degraded still, the ones who thrive and fatten upon the profits of the nefarious business, are recruited from somebody's home, and flowing from each house of prostitution is the deadly miasma of disease that drags down the innocent with the guilty. As a proof of this, untold thousands of babes are sacrificed every year, born of innocent mothers into respectable families, but with inherent tendency to disease, transmitted from sexual and venereal diseases, fostered by this traffic, such as the white plague, scrofula, rheumatism, cancer. Most of the diseases that baffle the skill of the medical profession find their origin here, and the taint thereof is handed down from generation to generation.

Some have had the hardihood to urge that prostitution is a safety valve of public morals; that it is a necessary evil; that woman's virtue depends upon the public brothel. It is difficult to believe that anyone should seriously urge this, and yet I expect that every Member sitting in this Chamber to-day has been flooded with literature purporting to have been written by some alleged agent of some vice crusade, in which lengthy tables are cited and learned authorities quoted to prove just these things. In other words, that virtue thrives on vice: that morality is promoted by immorality, and that woman's honor is protected by her dishonor; that homes are safeguarded by their invasion; and that prostitution is a guaranty of upright living. This idea is monstrous and absurd. It is an insult to every man's intelligence and to every good woman's honor.

We read now with almost skeptical unbelief that in olden times nations of such high civilization as Greece and Rome were accustomed to sacrifice maidens to appease the wrath of mythical gods. Such sacrifies, however, were attendant with re-ligious services and were not creeds to cloak the practice of It is hard to believe that people could be immoral rights. guilty of this who were civilized and intelligent, and yet, if these arguments are to be believed by us, we sacrifice not to the gods but to lust these 50,000 girls every year, and defend our course not upon the grounds that the sacrifice is demanded to protect a nation from the vengance of the gods but to protect our homes from the contamination of the vicious.

It is strange that one should think that by licensing crime that crime could thereby be lessened; that the weak, the poor, the ignorant must be sacrificed that the more favorably situated may be protected. Such a government and such protection is more monstrous than the ends sought to be averted. I for one refuse to be a party to this sacrifice. I refuse to be an agent through whom its rituals may be performed. By my vote I shall refuse to sanction this crime. But that such evil effects do not follow the enactment of a law of this kind, evidence of those who are familiar with its workings have abundantly disproved. The legislatures of 12 States have enacted laws of similar import, and the undisputed testimony of people who are familiar with the results following therefrom is that they have accomplished the very purpose for which they were enacted. Everyone connected with the operation of this law in Des Moines, Iowa, has agreed that the enactment of the law has reduced prostitution 75 per cent within the last four years; that instead of scattering these fallen women throughout the residence portion of the city fewer complaints are made than before, when they were attempting to enforce segregation.

One other question connected herewith, and one that has caused more or less uneasiness to the advocates of this measure. is the one of caring for the unfortunate inmates of these resorts when the results shall have been accomplished. Fortunately, there was before the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia people connected with charitable institutions situated within the city who offered to care for every one of these unfortunates and furnish them a home, food, shelter, and raiment; to teach them to become proficient in whatever trade or art their intellectual ability would warrant them in undertaking; furnish them places of honorable employment and to afford them every opportunity to become useful, respected, and trusted members of society. That all will not avail themselves of this opportunity goes without saying, but if the number that are rescued and reformed who once participated in lives of this kind is very few, indeed, this fact alone is an additional reason why we should enact and enforce this law in the Nation's Capital, that others may not be dragged down. Every mother who sits this day with a babe at her breast must be haunted by the fear of the fate that must overtake some-body's child if this traffic in woman's body and woman's soul should be granted a license to continue. Upon all of us rests a duty. We can not escape its responsibility. We are in truth our brother's keeper. With us rests the decision whether this traffic shall continue to drag to dishonor and to death its victims. If we license its continuance, the finger of an avenging justice will point us out and the wrath of an outraged people destroy us. If but one life is protected, one blighted, dishonored home circle restored, one wandering, erring, dying sister be rescued, we shall have done well. If one mother's prayer, perhaps the one whose letter I shall ask leave to read into the Record, shall be answered, I for one shall be satisfied. [Ap-

I have a letter here, Mr. Chairman, that I want to insert in the RECORD with my remarks. I reserve the balance of my time. The letter referred to follows:

JANUARY 22, 1914.

Hon. T. H. Caraway, Chairman Subcommittee, House District Committee.

Chairman Subcommittee, House District Committee.

My Dear Statesman: Pardon me, a poor mother. May I beg of you to do all you can for the passage of the Kenyon bill. My dear boy, in whom I may have to place my dependence for my entire support, I fear is going to ruin on account of this social evil and his visits to this disreputable and disgraceful section of our city. Can it be this den of vice will be allowed to remain? O God, drive these female deviis from our city—these vipers, destroying the youth. My dear Member, help a poor mother to save her son. May God give you power to close these places of prostitution. Do all you can, and I and many good mothers of this city will cherish the name of Congressman Caraway and your committee as long as we live.

Truly, yours,

A Mother.

A MOTHER.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.
Mr. MOORE. This bill proposes to suppress prostitution by the process of injunction?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. Has that result been effectively attained anywhere else in the country?

Mr. CARAWAY. The bill is practically a copy of the law that prevails in Iowa. Judge Prouts and Judge Towner, of that State, both, as I understand, occupied the bench in the city of Des Moines, and their testimony is that it has been entirely effective.

Mr. MOORE. The report, which I understand was prepared by the gentleman from Arkansas himself, indicates that laws of similar import are now on the statute books of 12 States, and that the unanimous testimony of those familiar with the opera-tion of the law is that "it accomplishes the result hereby sought." Does that mean that in those States the social vice has been eliminated?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not so understand; but it has been greatly reduced. The Iowa law is the oldest on the statute books, being about four years old; and Judge Towner and Judge PROUTY both say that prostitution has been reduced 75 per cent

Mr. MOORE. They say it has been reduced, but not suppressed?

Mr. CARAWAY, Not entirely,

Mr. MOORE. This bill, if passed, w This bill, if passed, would apply only so far as

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Did the gentleman read in one of the Washington papers this morning the statement that it would drive from the city-at least, drive from their haunts-at least 300 women?

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not see it.

Mr. MOORE. That statement was made in one of the Washington papers this morning, under the headlines "New law to rout red light's 300," and the article indicates that 300 women would have to leave certain houses in which they are harbored If this injunction law is enacted and the proprietors of these houses would be put out of business, so to speak, it will follow that these 300 women will have to go somewhere else, will it not?

Mr. CARAWAY. They will have to go somewhere else or abandon their course of living.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman tell, since I see he has given careful thought to this subject, whether there is any method provided by any of our friends who believe in the uplift of humanity to relieve this situation in which these 300 unfortunate women find themselves?

Mr. CARAWAY. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to mean whether the bill itself makes any provision for their care?

Mr. MOORE. No. I ask the gentleman whether any provision has been made by our moralist friends who are striving to do the right thing, to alleviate the condition of these 300 unfortunate women or to lead them into better lives? Is there any method by which these 300 women can be cared for at all?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; the Florence Crittenton Home, and another mission here, which, I believe, is known as the Jesus Will Help Mission, came before the committee and offered to take every one of these girls, furnish them a home, to clothe and feed them and teach them whatever occupation they are intellectually qualified to fill, and see that they get a place

If it should happen, upon the passage of this bill, that these houses of ill fame be closed and these women are driven out upon the streets, there would be a place for them to go and seek to reform? Mr. CARAWAY.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman familiar with efforts in other sections of the country to suppress this social vice after enactments of this kind have been made?

Mr. CARAWAY. I only know this: The lady in charge of the Florence Crittenton Home in this city, and one in Connecticut, whose name I do not recall, said that these homes had made preparations to care for every woman who wishes to abandon her way of living and to furnish her an opportunity to reform and become a useful citizen.

Mr. MOORE. Some years ago a movement of this kind-I think it was a local police regulation-drove these unfortunate women out of their homes in the city of Pittsburgh, and they applied to the mayor of the city for relief. They wanted to know where they were to go and what they were to do. Is the gentleman familiar with that situation?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not.
Mr. MOORE. If these 300 women do not choose to reform, then what shall be done with them?
Mr. CARAWAY. They will be compelled to seek some communities that are willing to tolerate them.

Mr. MOORE. Will they come into my community?
Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman is willing.
Mr. MOORE. Will they seek homes in the community in which the gentleman lives?

Mr. CARAWAY. No, sir. Mr. MOORE. I want to say to the gentleman that I am pleased to note the excellent moral and reform conditions which he stands for in his community, and I am none the less inclined to have those conditions prevail in my community.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not doubt that.

I do believe they prevail in my community, Mr. MOORE. and I want to know whether, if these 300 women are to be driven out of the city of Washington, they are to be driven into the city of Philadelphia or the city of New York.

Mr. CARAWAY. As I understand, the great State of Pennsylvania has already enacted a law similar to this to protect

Mr. MOORE. It is true that we have legislation pertaining to this subject now, and we undertake to regulate it; but I am asking what is going to happen despite legislation which does not effectually legislate? We enact a law saying there shall be prohibition—and there is absolute and complete legislative prohibition, for instance, in the State of Georgia; but still one may obtain liquor, in spite of prohibition, in the State of We may enact legislation in the District of Columbia suppressing prostitution, yet, I presume, prostitution will prein the District of Columbia as long as the District of Columbia lasts. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what is going to be done with the women that he drives out of the city of Washington? Are they going to be driven into other communi-

Mr. CARAWAY. They are going to be offered every opportunity to reform. If they decline to do it and the citizenship of the District of Columbia see to it that this law is enforced, these women will have to move. If some other community is willing to tolerate them, I presume they will seek homes there.

Mr. MOORE. Since the gentleman has given this matter careful thought, and has raised a question of morality which I certainly can not deny, but has also proposed a law which tends to evict and turn upon the street 300 unfortunate women. I want to ask the gentleman whether he or those good citizens with whom he confers contemplate any law which will tend to suppress the immorality of the man who is responsible for the unfortunate woman?

Mr. CARAWAY. I take it that if you suppress the woman the man will have to quit.

Mr. MOORE. If that statement were correct, then there would be absolutely no necessity for lynching bees in any section of the country, because the man would be deprived of those physical qualities which seem to have been imposed upon him by nature, and woman would be sterile. The gentleman raises a great moral question which I do not propose to discuss now, but in view of the fact that we are going to pass a law which points out 300 unfortunate women and scatters them broadcast, want to find out whether we are going in any way to provide for their uplift, and whether we propose to continue the inquiry until we can reach the men who have been responsible for their downfall.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MOORE. Yes; but I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Go ahead.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand you have a similar law in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Oh, no; we have a drastic law, but not an in-

Mr. BURNETT. But a law of a moral character. Is the gentleman opposed to the suppression of vice?

Mr. MOORE. I am opposed to vice. Of course I favor the suppression of vice, but I have a little bit of humanity left, and I am still asking, in view of the fact that we are going to pass a law that makes us close our eyes to actual conditions, what are we going to do to take care of these waifs of humanity?

Mr. BURNETT. I will ask the gentleman if he is in favor of the law that he has on the statute books of Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOORE. I am; but I am not in favor of satisfying ourselves with a law that resolves that this thing shall end, when we know that it will not be done. I am not in favor of passing laws to declare there is prohibition when there is no prohibition. I am not in favor of passing a law which says prostitution is suppressed when prostitution continues. There must be a moral as well as a legislative reform to make the sup-pression of vice effective. This law will not be an effective law in the moral sense, because it proposes to suppress some-thing which has existed since God made the light and will continue until the end of time. We can not wholly settle this question by enacting a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman that the gentleman from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman again my question. He says he is opposed to sumptuary laws because they do not always prohibit the crime they are intended to suppress. I want to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to a law against murder, robbery, and rape, because those crimes sometimes are committed?

Mr. MOORE. I am in favor of a law to punish murder and rape and robbery, or any other crime, but I know very well that a mere law without a moral standard behind it will not be effective as to the individual crime. My point is that the gentleman is simply raising a club over the heads of these unfortunate women. His law will not suppress prostitution. That requires moral treatment.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas reserves the balance of his time. He has used 35 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I have a great deal more sympathy for the boys who may be misled, for the men who may acquire disease, for the girls who may hereafter be led into houses of prostitution than I have for the 300 now engaged in that business in the District of Columbia. [Applause.] It is not possible for Congress, by legislation or otherwise, to make these women lead moral lives, but it is possible for Congress by legislation to at least make difficult open and notorious houses of prostitution, and I welcome any law which tends toward the end of moral conduct on the part of both men and women.

I shall vote for this bill, Mr. Chairman, however, with some doubt as to some of the provisions in the bill, in regard to both their constitutionality and their propriety. I rose mainly for the purpose of asking the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway], in charge of the bill, how far the committee had considered the right of Congress to impose a tax upon premises which were abated in a civil suit. Section 8 of the bill provides that whenever a permanent injunction is issued against any person for maintaining a nuisance, as herein defined, and so forth, there shall be assessed against the building in which it has been maintained a tax of $300. I take it that it is quite manifest that Congress would not have authority to provide that anyone can bring suit against anyone else in the civil courts and, if he obtains a judgment, a tax may be levied against the property-not as a penalty for violation of a law, not as a penalty for an act of crime or for a misdemeanor, but a mere tax levied arbitrarily against a piece of property because a permanent injunction has been granted. I do not undertake to say that is unconstitutional, because I have not sufficiently investigated the subject, but I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, or anyone else who has investigated the subject, what authority Congress has to provide for the levying or assessment of a direct tax against a particular piece of property?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MANN. Certainly.
Mr. PROUTY. I may say that question has been determined by the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa; it has been determined in the affirmative, so far as a law identical in terms with this is concerned. We have passed a law and have had it in force for twenty-odd years doing the same thing in the liquor business. That provision has been taken to the supreme court some four or five times in our State, and the constitutionality of the law has been fully sustained upon the theory that it is a ruisance, and that you can tax a nuisance out of existence, if necessary. The intent of this bill is to make property that is used for this immoral purpose a nuisance, and it is fundamental in equity jurisprudence that when you find a thing is a nuisance, there must be some method of abating it, and imposing a tax or penalty is one of the ways.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but where you have a permanent injunction abating a nuisance the nuisance has ceased. Thereafter you provide for the levying of a tax against the property.

Mr. PROUTY. Only in case it is used for that purpose. Mr. MANN. The nuisance is no longer continuing. nuisance has ceased. You have issued a permanent injunction against a nuisance, and you provide that thereafter the assessor or the chief of police shall levy a tax. I think, undoubtedly, if you provide that it is a violation of the law, you can assess a penalty; but if you assess a penalty, under the Constitution of the United States, for violating a law, there must be an opportunity for a jury trial.

Mr. PROUTY. I think the gentleman has misread the section.

Section 8 provides as follows:

That whenever a permanent injunction issues against any person for maintaining a nuisance as herein defined, or against any owner or agent of the building kept or used for the purpose prohibited by this act, there shall be assessed against said building and the ground upon which the same is located and against the person or persons maintaining said nuisance, and the owner or agent of said premises, a tax of $300.

This is a penalty imposed for having allowed the use of the property to become a nuisance.

Mr. MANN. Let me continue the reading:

The assessment of said tax shall be made by the assessor of the District of Columbia and shall be made within three months from the date of the granting of the permanent injunction. In case the assessor fails or neglects to make said assessment the same shall be made by the chief of police, and a return of said assessment shall be made to the collector of taxes. Said tax shall be a perpetual lien upon all property, both personal and real, used for the purpose of maintaining said nuisance, and the payment of said tax shall not relieve the person or building from any other penalties provided by law.

Here is a nuisance which you abate by a civil proceeding, and after the nuisance has been abated you direct the assessor to assess or levy a tax against the property of $300, or it might be any sum, if you have the authority to do it. I merely inquire what authority we have for doing that thing. I do not think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty] has yet explained the In other words, can Congress provide in any civil suit that in addition to any penalties that are provided for violation of a criminal statute the assessor at the end of the suit shall levy a tax against the property, not a tax to pay the cost of the proceedings, but a direct tax against the property?

Mr. BRYAN. I think the gentleman from Illinois will agree there would be no question if that were called a fine and made a lien against the particular property; if after trial it is determined certain property is engaged in this kind of business that the owners of that property shall be fined by levying a fine or making it a lien against the particular property. of course, is a little different procedure from the ordinary criminal statute, but it does, however, have exactly the same effect. It levies a fine and sees to it that it is collected against the property and provides the form of collecting, so that it can be collected the way the other taxes are collected. I will state that the same law is on the statute books of the State of Washington, the same provision in almost the identical words throughout, and particularly this section; and I believe, indeed, there is no mistake in putting in a provision of this kind, and it is exactly the way it has been interpreted in the various courts.

Mr. GORDON. Does the law of the gentleman from Washington authorize a temporary injunction without bond on proof of general reputation?

Mr. BRYAN. There is an injunction under the same terms as this bill.

Mr. GORDON. So much the worse for the statute.
Mr. BRYAN. I have read the two statutes together, and it provides for a permanent injunction upon proof after a temporary injunction upon affidavit.

Mr. GORDON. That he, on affidavit, believes that it has the reputation of being a house of prostitution?

Mr. BRYAN. I am not sure about the exact use of the word "reputation"; if it is in the bill here it is in the statute, as I have compared the two, and they are alike on that point.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make a speech upon this subject, but since it has developed that this statute is an exact copy almost of the statute that we have in Iowa I want to again announce what you perhaps all already know, that "in all that is good Iowa affords the best. plause.] We not only believe that vice is wrong, but we believe that if men want to suppress it they can. It is no strange or unusual power brought into play in this bill. Since the foundation of our courts of equity they have declared what are nuisances and have assessed fines and penalties to suppress them. A good many years ago, some 25 or 30 years ago. Iowa brought into practical use this power of the courts of equity and made it applicable to the suppression of illegal sales of liquor. In other words, by declaring that a house or building in which liquors were illegally sold were nuisances the courts of equity used the strong arm of equity jurisdiction to suppress the nuisance. About four years ago we extended the same equity jurisdiction for the suppression of houses of .il fame, and that is all there is in the bill that is now before us. As you have noticed it does not create any new crime, it does not declare anything a crime that was not a crime before this bill will be enacted, but it simply undertakes to use the strong arm of the equity jurisdiction of this country for the suppression of this

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PROUTY. I will.
Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will look at the bill, page 2, line 17, he will find, without reading the whole section, that these injunctions are temporarily issued without bond. I will ask him if that section is identical with the section in his own State?

Mr. PROUTY. No, sir; it is a little better than the section in our State.

Mr. SISSON. Is it not very unusual, and perhaps a departure from all the rules of equity, to permit an injunction to be issued upon affidavit or upon a preliminary hearing to issue an injunction without bond? We all understand you may pray for an injunction without hearing, and upon final trial and after the court has adjudicated the matter, then he may issue the injunction without bond. But prior to the trial, prior to the determination of the question of fact and bond, is it not an unusual proceeding to permit an injunction to issue closing a place of busi-

Mr. PROUTY. To what section do you refer?
Mr. SISSON. Page 2, line 17, of the bill. I want to get an answer to the question, because it is so unusual. I would like to know whether or not any State has permitted these injunctions to issue unless a bond is required?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, answering the question of the gentleman, I will say that such injunctions are very common in the State of Iowa.

Mr. SISSON. On the affidavit of an individual and not instituted by the government itself?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They are; but it is in a particular class of cases, and I think the gentleman has overlooked the dis-It is against acts forbidden by the criminal law of the State and where it is alleged that the defendants have violated the criminal laws of the State.

Mr. SISSON. I can not yield the floor to anybody now.
Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr.
Prouty] yielded to me. The liquor laws of our State provide that such an injunction may issue against the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and that the business may be temporarily closed, if necessary, to carry out the purposes of the injunction, although the writ does not go that far as a rule. But injunctions of this class are issued in liquor cases almost every day in the State of Iowa, and nobody is harmed by it, because they simply require the defendant to conform to the criminal law of the State.

Mr. SISSON. I am familiar with many State statutes along that line, but that is after the party has been convicted; that is after you have had a trial on the merits of the case, and then, when he has been tried, an injunction has been issued. my own State, where a man is convicted of unlawfully retailing or conducting a certain business, the court can issue an injunction if the proof, after he is convicted, shows he has been engaged in that business, and he can be enjoined.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That does not stop any legal business. Mr. SISSON. How do you determine whether it is legal or illegal without giving him a hearing?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We do not enjoin him at all from any legal act. He is simply enjoined against illegal acts.

Mr. SISSON. You can not tell whether the act has been committed or not. How do you know whether the act has been committed or not? There is a great deal of difference between knowledge and proof. A court may know a thing, but he has to know it by seeing it or by his senses, and if the court has no knowledge of a crime whatever, no knowledge of an illegal business, and a stranger comes in and makes an affidavit that a certain thing exists, it does not follow as a matter of law that it is true it does exist. It is the duty of the court to investigate whether it is true or not. This struck me as being a most unusual proceeding, and I do not believe, without taking issue with the gentleman, he will find it true in his own State.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me, I sat on the bench during 20 years and administered these laws.

Mr. SISSON. Is this the exact language of the law of your State?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Our law, if anything, is stronger than The court does not adjudicate that the party against whom the injunction is issued has violated the law, simply enjoins him from violating it, and he will not be punished except on hearing and when it is found he has violated the law.

Mr. SISSON. Now, will the gentleman yield a little further? Mr. PROUTY. I prefer to yield only to a question, and later on the gentleman can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. SISSON. I do not wish to take up so much time, but I want to have it made clear in my own mind what this section means with the words "without bond" in it.

Now, of course, all of us are in sympathy with the aim and purpose of the bill, but in writing a bill we ought to be certain to strike out the evil we want to hit, without leaving open too much opportunity for an abuse of the power granted under the act.

If you will strike out these two words, "without bond," in so far as the private citizen is concerned, there will be no opportunity for one to wreak his spleen; there will be no opportunity for men to take advantage of the law for the purpose of injuring some individual for an ulterior motive and an ulterior pur-

If the Government issues this injunction through its proper officer, if a Government official does it-the attorney of the Government—then it is proper that it should be without bond. The State ought not to be required to give bond nor should the Federal Government be required to give bond. But when a private individual steps in without the knowledge or intervention of some officer who has made inquiry into this matter and has satisfied himself in regard to it, then, it seems to me, that when the private individual asks for this equity remedy for the purpose of suppressing this nuisance, he ought to be called upon to give a bond just as he is called upon to give a bond to abate any other nuisance under any other statute which may deal with vice and those things which are obnoxious in a neighborhood,

Mr. PROUTY. I think that a full answer to that can be given by a careful reading of the bill itself. I think the gentleman has misconceived the scope and purpose of the act. there may be language in it that might be a little bit misleading on first examination, yet it will be found by reading the bill in its entirety that upon the presentation of a petition asking for a temporary injunction, the court only has power to grant it upon three days' notice-a thing that is not common in the ordinary exercise of that equity power.

We had considerable discussion in this House, as you all know, on the question as to whether or not the Federal courts should exercise that power in labor-union troubles without first giving notice, and at the last session we passed a law on that subject.

Now this bill, contrary to what is done in the State of Iowa and other States, requires that three days' notice be given before the granting of the temporary injunction, and then if the party does not appear, or if he appears and asks for a continuance, then the temporary injunction issues as a matter of course, but still the permanent injunction is not granted until further hearing by the court at the following term of court.
Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; with pleasure.
Mr. SISSON. Now, he gives three days' notice. I should think that is right and fair, and especially as a private citizen can make the affidavit without giving bond. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that serious abuses may occur if any private citizen can make such affidavits at will without giving bond? We must admit that many people will take all sorts of advantage of an opportunity such as would be afforded under this bill to injure other people. What remedy under this statute would a perfectly reputable man or woman have if a designing man or woman should file an affidavit against that individual in the conduct of his or her home, or boarding house, or hotel, or any class of business in which the person is engaged, even when it is perfectly reputable? What remedy would that person have against the party who slanders him or her under this statute?

Mr. PROUTY. The individual would have the same remedy that he has now if a person goes before the grand jury or any place else and makes a charge against you. There is no injunction issued unless the man appears.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. In just a moment. There days' notice, injunction issued until the fellow has had three days' notice. In just a moment. There is no temporary bill here provides that the party complaining may file an affidavit, even if it is false and proven to be false and without foundation, as this bill states here, merely "upon reputation or otherwise, by depositions or oral testimony or otherwise, as the complainant may elect." Notice the language, "as the complainant may elect." He can seek his own method of filing the charges against the individual. What remedy would the individual have?

Mr. PROUTY. I might say this in answer to that question: Of course, there is no statute that can protect every right that a man has. If, for instance, a man appears and files an information against you to-day, although it be absolutely false, yet in a certain sense it blights your reputation for all time, and you can not help that, and there is no power in the courts to prevent that. But here a man appears and files an information or petition in equity, setting out certain facts, but before anything is done in that matter the man has three days' notice of it, and he has to come here, and if he is so innocent as the man you use as an illustration he ought to be able to prevent the court from issuing a temporary injunction at all.

Mr. SISSON. The law presumes him to be innocent, anyway, whether he is or not.

Mr. PROUTY. That is true in all court proceedings, but you can never get to the point where you can prevent anyone from filing a false charge, either in a petition in equity or in the criminal courts of this country. You can not get away from that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gen-tleman from Iowa if an action for malicious prosecution will not lie?

Mr. TOWNER. Surely it will, and it has. Mr. SISSON. It may be that I am in error, because I have not had time to study this proposition carefully, but here is the point in my mind: If I go before a justice of the peace, or if I go before a chancery clerk in Mississippi-we still have the chancery jurisdiction there-and make a false affidavit for the purpose of inducing the arm of the court to be put in motion, and it is shown that my allegations are false and that I am actuated by animus, then I may be liable in a suit for damages.

Mr. PROUTY. Would you not in this case?
Mr. SISSON. That is the point I want to get at.
Mr. PROUTY. Why not? This is an equity suit, a civil suit. Mr. SISSON. Its foundation, however, is upon general repu-

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PROUTY. That only applies to the trial.
Mr. TOWNER. That applies to the hearing for the permanent injunction, not to the temporary injunction.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I should like to say that this bill itself covers that matter.

Mr. SISSON. The affidavit is filed, and the temporary injunction may be issued.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The question of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] is answered on page 3, at the bottom of the page, where it provides protection against that kind of a case, because where an action is brought by a citizen and it is not sustained the costs are taxed against him.

Mr. SISSON. That touches exactly the point I have in mind. In other words, the very act itself fixes the penalty for the false affidavit and says that shall be the limit of the damage, and the limit of the remedy is the costs incurred, which might be nominal, and the only remedy for a blasted reputation and a vile and slanderous affidavit would be merely the payment of a miserable little petty cost bill. The very act itself takes away from the injured person the right to bring a suit for damages. see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Anderson] shaking his head, but that is the point I have in mind-that the very act itself takes away from the injured party the right to recover any damages against the man who makes the false affidavit.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to occupy the floor for a few minutes.

Mr. SISSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I wanted to get the information.

Mr. PROUTY. I think the gentleman has made himself clear, and I think that he has not examined this bill with the care that his legal acumen would warrant us in believing he had, because there is nothing strange in this bill. It is not different from any petition in equity that you would file in any court. If anybody should appear in court and file a petition charging that the gentleman had been guilty of fraud, deception, and deceit in securing the transfer to him of certain property, and that allegation was absolutely false, and upon the trial the case was dismissed at the other fellow's cost, does the gentleman, as a keen, astute lawyer, say that that would end his claim for damages against the man who had slandered him by filing a fictitious claim in court? Certainly not.

Mr. SISSON. Without having had very much time to examine the bill, I am inclined to think that the last sentence on page 3 fixes the liability incurred by the citizen, and it seems as though it was placed in the bill intentionally for the purpose of limiting the remedy to the costs. I do not believe a court will ever hold the maker of a false affidavit liable in damages, even if the action is dismissed because there was no reasonable ground for the bringing of the complaint, unless it is also shown that it was a malicious prosecution with some animus in it. The plaintiff in the action for damages would have to show that the suit was brought for the purpose of injuring him, and not for the real purpose alleged in the affidavit.

Mr. PROUTY. As the gentleman will notice, this act is very mild. If the action is brought by a citizen, and the court finds there was no reasonable ground or cause for such action, the costs may be taxed against that citizen. Now, I presume there

Mr. SISSON. Does not the gentleman believe that that is the end of the matter?

Mr. PROUTY. No; but let me ask the gentleman, Have you not in your State a provision that where a prosecution is wantonly begun, without proper grounds therefor, the costs may be taxed against the prosecuting witness?

Mr. SISSON. We have no statute. That is a rule of court or a rule of common law. It is not necessary to have a statute.

Mr. PROUTY. Does the gentleman believe that if there was such a statute after the case had been dismissed and you bring suit against him for malicious prosecution that could plead as full bar that the costs had been taxed up against him?

Mr. SISSON. That is also the law; the court can do that under the common law. So far as I know, where a man enters a court of equity, if he failed to get the remedy he prays for he is taxed with the costs, and he must give bond when he gets the arm of the court in motion, not only security for costs but for any damages that may occur by reason of the injunction. If the Government does that alone, of course it is not necessary to have the bond, but I do believe in this case that the bond should be required of an individual citizen.

Mr. PROUTY. When should he give the bond? Mr. SISSON. When he sues out the writ.

Mr. PROUTY. There may be no writ issued; he does have to put up a bond as soon as the writ issues.

Mr. SISSON. The court does not have to issue a writ of injunction on the filing of the affidavit. He may say that he will give a preliminary hearing before the writ issues, and before the writ issues they always require a bond in my State in a court of equity for this extraordinary remedy.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. Both gentlemen have used the term "malicious prosecution." Can a suit be brought for malicious prosecution against somebody who has failed in a bill of equity against the defendant?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; if he has brought it without foundation. Mr. MANN. Such suits in equity are brought every day without being successful, and I never heard of a suit for malicious prosecution being brought.

Mr. PROUTY. If the gentleman will go out and examine the supreme court decisions of the State of Iowa, he will find where a man was mulcted in the sum of $10,000 for that very thing.

Mr. MANN. For filing a bill in equity?
Mr. PROUTY. Maliciously filing a bill in equity without proper grounds, for the clear purpose of slandering and maligning his opponent.

Mr. SISSON. That is true in Illinois.
Mr. MANN. I do not think so. May I ask the gentleman from Iowa another question?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This bill provides that if the defendant asks for a continuance when the bill is first heard on the question of a preliminary injunction, if it is continued at his instance, the writ as prayed shall be granted as a matter of course.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is this writ to be granted as a matter of course for a permanent injunction because a man asks for a continuance after three days' notice?

Mr. PROUTY. The jentleman from Illinois misconceives the two sections. Section 2 deals with the temporary injunction, and the next section with the permanent injunction.

Mr. MANN. I am not misconceiving the two sections. The gentleman does not understand the question.

Mr. PROUTY. I understand the question and I understand the bill. Section 2, which deals with the temporary injunction, says that three days' notice in writing shall be given the defendant of the hearing of the application, and if then continued at his instance the writ as prayed shall be granted as a matter of course. The next section deals with the permanent in-

Mr. MANN. Section 2 says that three days' notice shall be given in writing of the hearing of the application, and if then as a matter of course." Now, if that does not mean what it says, what does it mean?

Mr. PROUTY. That is a temporary injunction.
Mr. MANN. The prayer in the bill shall be granted, and the prayer in the bill is for a permanent injunction.

Mr. PROUTY. It means a temporary injunction.
Mr. MANN. That is not the language of the bill, and it ought to so state.

Mr. PROUTY. I think it does so state.

Mr. MANN. I think it does not; and why not make it clear? Mr. PROUTY. I am not the author of the bill; I am defending its legal aspect the best I can,

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. PROUTY. I will.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to know the gentleman's construction of section 8, page 6, lines 16, 17, and 18. This section provides for a tax of $300 for those who maintain a nuisance, and then it says:

Said tax shall be a perpetual lien upon all property, both personal and real, used for the purpose of maintaining said nuisance, and the payment of said tax shall not relieve the person or building from any other penalties provided by law.

Now, I think the students of this social problem have run across cases where this social evil has been perpetuated by a custom of imposing fines. This would appear to make that, after the payment of the $300 fine, an institution that may be maintained. Am I right about that?

Mr. PROUTY. No.

Mr. MOORE. Lines 16, 17, and 18 on page 6, in section 8, provides:

Said tax shall be a perpetual lien upon all property, both personal and real, used for the purpose of maintaining said nuisance.

"Maintaining" means to continue. The fine has been levied and the question is whether the nuisance continues.

Mr. PROUTY. That simply identifies the property on which the court has issued its inhibition and assessed a fine of $300, or a tax of $300, which remains as a perpetual lien on that property, just like the court would declare it in any other equity proceedings.

Mr. MOORE. It says here-

Used for the purpose of maintaining said nuisance.

Mr. PROUTY. That is merely a matter of identification. Mr. MOORE. The gentleman's interpretation of it is that it does not mean that after the levying of a $300 tax the institu-

Mr. PROUTY. It does not mean that, of course. It means that they are perpetually and forever enjoined from using that as a house of prostitution-forever, not merely for one day or for one week, but forever.

Mr. MOORE. I suppose the gentleman has heard of instances and of communities where, the fine having been imposed, the business went on just the same until another fine

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; and that is the very objection that I have to this whole system of what is called segregation. bill does not make the act of prostitution a crime, but it simply provides a remedy. The gentlemen who are talking about segregation must be aware of the fact that there is no law authorizing segregation. These houses in the place known as the redlight district do not exist by virtue of the tolerance of any law. They exist simply through the connivance of men who daily violate the law. I defy the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] or anyone from any other State to show me a single line in the laws, organic or otherwise, of the District of Columbia that will permit the keeping of public houses of prostitution in the city of Washington; and yet when you talk about destroying them they jump up and say, "Why, you are going to scatter the people in They are there now unlawfully, and, as I said before on the floor of this House, there is no one thing, in my opinion, that has done so much to corrupt our cities, to create so much graft, as this winking at the laws affecting prostitution. If the police force in a city is justified by public sentiment in winking at the violations of law, it is a short step to the point where they will wink at such violations harder if somebody gives them some money to do it. [Applause.] Every commission that has examined this question in every important city in the United States says that it lies at the very foundation of all or nearly all of the graft schemes that have been devised by the police force to get money.

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes. Mr. BOWDLE. Does the gentleman not know that this question of prostitution has been discussed and plagued legislators for 10,000 years, and that little or no progress has been made with it by legislation? And is it not primarily a moral ques-

Mr. PROUTY. I do not know that. I have no authentic record extending back that far.

Mr. BOWDLE. Does not the gentleman know that a thousand years before the foundation of the pyramids was laid precisely the same argument that he has been making was used?

Mr. PROUTY. The gentleman can go into antiquity farther than I intend my speech shall go, I assure him; but I do say this, that no sane man will claim that any law can absolutely do away with the vice or depravity of the human heart; but I do say, notwithstanding the great antiquity of the gentleman's argument, it is possible for States, for nations, and for municipalities to wipe out commercialized, open, flaunting vice. [Applause.] You may not do away with concubines or mistresses or anything of that kind, but you can prevent vice flaunting itself in the face of every man who walks down the streets of a city. It is not the expectation or the hope of the framers and advocates of this bill that it will make every man virtuous or every woman virtuous, but we do hope to limit at least the temptations that are constantly thrown in the way of both men and women.

One of the constant arguments brought against this kind of measures-in fact, the only one that has reached me through the mails—is the fact that it will scatter the residents of these places out into the respectable portions of the community. have given a good deal of thought to that proposition and, as far as I am concerned, I have reached this conclusion, that if we must have these houses-if, as some gentlemen say, they are works of absolute necessity-why, it is better to have them in the so-called respectable communities than to have them down among the poor people of our towns. Why, under a law like this, or even without this, the strong, the rich, and powerful can exercise the law for the purpose of protecting their homes, but if the police rope off a little district in which live the poor people of the city and say that vice here may go unbridled and unrestrained, you have heaped a burden upon those people that they themselves can not correct. I repeat that, in my judgment, it is just as important as a national problem to protect the morals of what is commonly called the people living in the slums as it is the people living on Massachusetts Avenue. In other words, I believe that more real damage comes to the Republic and to the Nation by the festering of this crime in the slums and alleys and in the back places of the city than it would if it were put on the hilltop where everybody could see it.

Now, as I rose to say, this law put upon the statute books in Iowa for the purpose of giving to the persons charged with the duty of getting rid of this evil the strong power of the equity jurisdiction of the court. Despite all the arguments that have been suggested here to-day, and I confess I had some doubt about it myself, I can say candidly after four years of trial in the State of Iowa, and especially in the city in which I live, the city of Des Moines, it is found to work admirably. mayor and the health and police departments have recently reported that we have not more than 25 per cent of the amount of evil in the unsegregated districts that we had before when we had the segregated district. In other words it has been the experience of our State, and I think it is found to be the experience of most of the States, that these so-called segregated districts are made the hatching places from which women emanate and go out into these other territories to exercise their nefarious game, and when you have destroyed the hatching places you have gone a long ways toward destroying it in all the unsegregated portions of the city, and every city that has reported upon this proposition has given that as a result of their observation. But if, as I say, it is necessary to scatter them, I insist that it is infinitely better to scatter them than to keep them where they become a festering sore. I know, take it in this city, every time a man gets up here and says anything, for instance, about the half-and-half plan some fellow will say, "Oh, we want here a beautiful city, the pride of the Nation," and in that I join. I am in favor of having a beau-"Oh, we want here a beautiful city, the pride of the tiful city, but I want to say to my friends that there is nothing that will so add to the glory, the dignity, and renown of the Capital of this Nation as to have it the cleanest place morally. [Applause.] When people come here and look at our beautiful buildings and our beautiful parks and our streets they will commend that, but if they see these houses on every side they will go home and report that, and I for one will be glad; I would be proud of the fact that when the people of foreign nations come to visit the Capital of this the greatest Nation on earth they would see that there are now no open houses of prostitution [applause]; that it is clean morally as well as adorned beautifully. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a strong measure. is the kind of legislation that has been long needed in this Dis-When this bill is voted upon I hope it will be passed by this House without a dissenting voice. As the gentleman said a few moments ago, there have been in times past many arguments made for the suppression of this vice. And, too, for centuries, extending back a thousand years before the building of the pyramids, arguments were made for and against the segregation of this vice. But I do not agree with the inferences of the gentleman that this vice can not be largely suppressed and eradicated by proper legislation such as this.

In times not long past it was maintained by the seemingly most convincing and most attractive arguments that the traffic in intoxicating liquor could not be suppressed or done away with by legislation, and that it was unwise and uneconomical to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor and to do away with the saloon business. I well recall in my own State about 25 years ago the argument was frequently offered that the towns and the cities of the State could not be supported in their organizations without revenue from saloon licenses; that no town or city could have and maintain broad, beautiful, well-kept streets without having licensed saloons; that constitutional prohibition would mean that the streets and avenues of our towns and cities would be soon grass-grown and deserted. Nearly 25 years of constitutional prohibition, aided by strong statutory laws, has completely disproven all these and such other fallacious arguments offered by the proponents of the liquor interests. is no State in this Union to-day where the towns and cities are more clean; where the streets are broader and more beautiful or kept in better condition and repair; where the indebtedness of the towns and cities is less; where the public and private buildings are finer or more modern; where the home life is better and where the homes are happier than in prohibition North Dakota.

We have on the statute books of my State a law similar to this measure. It has been of the greatest service in enabling honest officials to rid the State of many blind piggers and bootleggers and to bring summary punishment to well-to-do properry owners who, that their properties might be leased at exorbitant rentals, conspired with and upheld bootleggers and blind piggers in violations of the laws.

As I understand the provisions of this law, it makes stronger the laws we already have against this vice. It not only enables the honest official to quickly reach with the law the women who persist in this vice, but it also enables the honest official to reach with the penalties of the law the rich property owners whose tenants these women may be found to be. takes nothing away from existing laws against this vice. gives to the present law the additional strong arm of the equity jurisdiction of the court, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty] has so well said.

From my own experience as a prosecuting attorney, I know that if we have here in the District of Columbia the character of judges and the character of prosecuting officers we should have, every public house of prostitution in the District can and will be suppressed within 24 hours after this bill becomes a law.

The District of Columbia is a most fitting place to put the stamp of strong legislative and public disapproval on this vice. Here at the Nation's Capital, where citizens of every State come almost daily, it is well that we set a high moral and civic This standard, maintained as it should be here, will be a most wonderful influence for good and for right living in every city in every State in our country.

I trust that the enactment of this bill will at no distant future date be followed by the enactment of a law to en-tirely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage in You will find when these laws have been placed on the statute books in this District and have been put into effective operation the arguments now advanced against them will be seen by the least discerning to be unsound and fallacious.

The recent extended investigations made concerning the causes and extent of this vice in this country and in European countries clearly demonstrates that segregation tends to increase rather than to suppress this vice. Attempted segregation of this vice is most dangerous to the best interest of so-Segregated vice districts offer the most alluring and dangerous pitfalls for our young boys and girls who are now growing up and who are to be the men and women of to-morrow. This law will destroy the public homes of this vice and make its practice most difficult.

In conclusion I wish again to say that I hope there will not be a dissenting voice against this bill when it is put on its final passage in this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARDWICK). The Clerk will read the

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

During the reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read now, as the Chair is informed, for amendment, and therefore the request of the gentleman is not in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. That whenever a nuisance is kept. maintained, or exists as defined in this act the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, or the Attorney General of the United States, or any citizen bill may have been somewhat crudely drawn, nevertheless they of the District of Columbia may maintain an action in equity in the name of the United States of America, upon the relation of such attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, the Attorney General of the United States, or citizen, to perpetually enjoin said nuisance, the person or persons conducting or maintaining the same, and the owner or agent of the building or ground upon which said nuisance exists. In such action the court, or a judge in vacation, shall, upon the presentation of a petition therefor alleging that the nuisance complained of exists, allow a temporary writ of lajunction, without bond, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court or judge by evidence in the form of affidavits, depositions, oral testimony, or otherwise, as the complainant may elect, unless the court or judge by previous order shall have directed the form and manner in which it shall be presented. Three days' notice, in writing, shall be given the defendant of the hearing of the application, and if then continued at his instance the writ as prayed shall be granted as a matter of course. When an injunction has been granted it shall be binding on the defendant throughout the District of Columbia, and any violation of the provisions of injunction herein provided shall be a contempt as hereinafter provided.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, after the word "the," insert the word "said." Strike out the words "as prayed" after the word "writ."

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think while it is true that this section 2 does seem to have to do with the temporary written injunction, the language in line 24 as it now stands would authorize the issuance of the permanent writ of injunction in case the defendant asks for a continuance. think that is apparently not the intention of the framers of the bill, and yet the words "the writ as prayed" would mean the issuance of the writ of permanent injunction, because it is that writ that is prayed for in the bill. And if the amendment I propose carries it will clear it up and it will mean that when the defendant asks for a continuance the writ that will issue will be the temporary writ, pending the hearing on the question of whether or not the injunction should be permanent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman; that language to which he refers might be so interpreted if it were not taken into consideration that in every one of these petitions the petitioner must ask for the temporary writ, as well as for a permanent injunction. Merely because he will also ask for a permanent writ would not necessarily imply that the court at that time could grant a permanent injunction. This section of the bill refers to temporary injunctions only.

The succeeding section makes provision regarding permanent injunctions. This provision clearly refers not to the issuance of the permanent injunction, but it refers to the issuance of the temporary writ, because the petition must ask for the temporary writ, if it is desired, as well as the permanent writ.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly. Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Assuming that the bill prays for wo writs—a temporary writ and a permanent writ—of injunction, then the use of the language here, "the writ as prayed," is at least indefinite, is it not?

Mr. TOWNER. It would be, perhaps, if it were not for the fact that this section and all the provisions immediately in connection with this provision refer to the temporary writ and not to the permanent writ. Let me say to the gentleman also that all of these propositions have been considered and passed upon.

They have been urged before our courts, and they have been passed upon and determined adversely. Some of the objections urged this afternoon have been taken to the Supreme Court of Iowa and some have been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and all of the provisions of the law have been sustained, so far, in the courts.

Let me further say this: I admit that the language of this bill is not entirely clear and free from ambiguity; is not, perhaps, what it ought to be; but it has been before the courts of half a dozen different States, and it has been sustained in its present form in the courts. Would it not be better for us now not to try to amend it when we know what has been its interpretation in the courts and that interpretation has been satisfactory?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; I would be glad to.
Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated that this law has been before the courts of half a dozen States. Can the gentleman tell what States those are?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I can not name all of them just at this moment.

That is what the gentleman said.

have been before half a dozen States and have always been

Mr. MANN. What State courts have the terms of this bill been before except the courts of Iowa?

Mr. TOWNER. They have been adopted by 12 different

I asked the question awhile ago, and nobody could tell. Could the gentleman from Iowa tell what half dozen States have passed this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Iowa may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner] may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. I have the list of States here which I can give to the gentleman. The States referred to are Nebraska, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Minnesota, South Dakota, Kansas, Utah, California, Oregon, and Washington, besides Iowa.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that those States have passed laws in the terms of this bill?

Mr. TOWNER, Yes, substantially. I think I can say to the gentleman from Illinois that very many of them have followed absolutely the language of the Iowa statute.

Mr. MANN. My impression was, from what I had heard, that no other State had passed a law just like this; that other States had passed somewhat similar laws, but no other law had been passed in the terms of this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is certainly mistaken.

Mr. MANN. That is not unlikely.

Mr. TOWNER. There are 12 States that have adopted a law which in all essentials is as this law, and, indeed, based upon it and patterned after it. I think some of them are in terms better. I think the Minnesota law, which was passed subsequently to the Iowa law, is in better form than this. But this bill has already passed the Senate. If we pass it in its present form, it will not have to go again to the Senate. It has been considered and approved by the courts. Will it not be better to pass it as it is, without taking any chances, if we are satisfied that in substance it is right and will accomplish the desired results?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am very much in favor of this bill, and I am anxious that anything in it which is indefinite should be cleared up. This amendment that I am proposing goes definitely to the form of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. And does not the gentleman think that if the amendment is adopted the language will be clearer than it is now?

Mr. TOWNER. I am frank to confess that originally would have placed the phraseology of the bill in somewhat different form, but it has already been passed upon, and it is now before us from the Senate with the approval of the Senate.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Of course, it is quite possible to send it back to the Senate with an improved form, and they can there agree to the amendments.

Mr. TOWNER. But we had better agree to this form rather than take any chances

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is my duty, in view of the fact that I had said I had read this bill and the bill of my State and had found them identical in several particulars, to say that this particular sentence is not a part of the statute of the State of Washington. That particular sentence is out.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is a part of the law of any other State than the State of Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Thomson].

The question was taken; and on a division (ordered by the Chairman) there were-yeas 24, nays 36.

So the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

the costs of the action and abatement, and the balance, if any, shall be paid to the defendant.

Mr. RAKER. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think the last word of the section, the word "defendant," might well be changed? The defendant may not be the owner, but simply the lessee.

Mr. IGOE. This refers to the defendant in the suit.

Mr. RAKER. The defendant in the suit may not be the owner at all. The defendant may be the lessee. Ought not the word to be "owner" instead of "defendant"?

Mr. IGOE. It relates to the owner of the property that is sold. Mr. RAKER. Not necessarily. It may not be the owner at all. Mr. IGOE. The property could not be sold unless the party who owned it was made a defendant.

Mr. RAKER. Not necessarily. You may commence an action against a building and find furniture in it, and the owner of the building may be a defendant but the owner of the personal property may not.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman permit? Mr. RAKER. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman understand that all parties who are to be adversely affected must be made defendants?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. Mr. TOWNER. And the owner of the personal property or the owner of the real property, or if they are separately owned, both of them must be made defendants. Clearly this would refer to the defendant who owned the property. I agree with you that the wording might be better, but this does not work any wrong or injustice.

Mr. RAKER. Is it the purpose not to amend the bill at all, so that it will not have to go back to the Senate?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that would probably be the best thing.

Mr. RAKER. If that is the object, I will not insist upon an amendment.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill. Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLARK of Florida, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 234) to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose; and to assess a tax against the person maintaining said nuisance and against the building and owner thereof, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The announcement of the result was received with applause. On motion of Mr. Johnson of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DEEDS TO PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 9842) to require the recital of the real consideration in deeds to property in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful for any recorder of deeds or other recording officer or any of his deputies or clerks to put to record any deed of conveyance of any real estate in the District of Columbia unless said deed of conveyance is accompanied by a statement of the grantor, subscribed and sworn to before some one authorized to administer an oath, to the effect that the consideration, set out in the said deed of conveyance, is the entire and real consideration actually passed or to be passed, which statement shall be filed and preserved in the office where such deed of conveyance is recorded.

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

shall be or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

Nor shall any consideration for the execution of any such aforesaid deed which is greater than the consideration mentioned therein be collectible or enforcable in any court of law or equity.

Any person who shall swear faisely in making the statement herein provided for shall be deemed guilty of perjury and subject to all the penalties imposed by law for that offense.

Any recording officer, deputy or clerk, who shall violate the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be removed from office and, in addition thereto, pay a fine of $100.

With the fallewing committee amendment:

With the following committee amendment:

SEC. 6. That the proceeds of the sale of the personal property, as provided in the preceding section, shall be applied in the payment of District of Columbia."

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, before we get to the amendable stage I should like to hear a little statement as to the of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I was about to make an explanation of the bill when interrupted by the reading of the committee amendment.

The practice has prevailed in the District of Columbia of but seldom reciting the real consideration for which real estate passes title. I believe that more than 95 per cent of the deeds of conveyance of real estate in the District of Columbia recite the consideration of $10. The real consideration is desirable, so the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the assessors of the District of Columbia say, for the purpose of aiding in getting at the real value of property to be assessed. It requires no long argument—in fact, it requires none at all, I believe-to demonstrate the necessity for this legislation. The need for the bill is self-evident.

But whatever reason there may have been for the passage of the bill before has now been increased because of the incometax law. The profit which a man may make upon a piece of real estate can be more accurately obtained by those who wish to enforce the law if the consideration is recited rather than concealed. As I said, I think the reasons for the passage of the bill are so self-evident that they do not need to be argued before any body, much less one like this,

I reserve the remainder of my time. Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the proposition to have deeds express the true consideration, but it seems to me that it is entirely improper to outlaw a deed or instrument conveying property if it does not contain this affidavit. For instance, a person living away from here owns a lot in the city of Washington. He sells it and the deed is sent to him to be signed. It is signed and sent here for record without providing the unusual and extraordinary affidavit that this bill requires. It is a requirement that does not apply to deeds anywhere else in the country. It is often somewhat difficult to get parties together to sign a deed. Sometimes a dozen heirs sign a deed, and it is necessary to send it from place to place to get it signed. To require that the heirs down in Louisiana, for instance, must make the affidavit required by this bill is, it seems to me, the putting of too great a burden on the system of registering transfers of title when it is provided that such a deed not accompanied by such affidavit can not be recorded.

I think it right to prohibit misrepresentation, to prohibit putting false valuation in a deed, and to attempt to overcome the bad features in that way; but I can not agree, nor can I understand why it is legitimate or right to thus absolutely outlaw an instrument of conveyance unless it contains that affidavit.

Many times a deed is made just before death by one who desires to execute a conveyance hurriedly. It may be scratched off on paper that may be picked up, an instrument made with out a formal blank, and a notary called in and acknowledgment made, and then perhaps the grantor dies. Under this act, if made into law, the deed could not be recorded, because it did not have the affidavit in relation to consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit e. The gentleman from Washington well knows that no lien attaches on deferred payments unless set out in the deed. great frauds are committed by reciting only a nominal consideration and then afterwards going to great expense of those who are concerned in creating a trust or mortgage upon it in order to carry liens for deferred payments. If this bill should become a law, the deferred payments could be carried as a lien without resorting to the practice which has become so fraudulent and expensive.

Mr. BRYAN. But the fact remains that when a person in a remote State or in a foreign country, some one who bought a lot in the District of Columbia, sees fit to transfer the property for a valid consideration and executes a deed in accordance with the custom of the place where he lives, acknowledges it before a notary public in any State in the Union or a commisstoner of deeds in a foreign country or before a consul, and sends the deed here for record and then dies, so that a new deed could not be made, the property could not pass, but remains in the estate, or a suit to quiet title must be tried and judgment entered. I think to thus attach it to the land, to make it a provision that runs with the land, and must be carried on the abstract is improper. Every abstract in the District of Columbia and hereafter each and every conveyance would have to be investigated by lawyers who are investigating titles in order to determine if the affidavit was made and filed in accordance with the statute. If the affidavit was not made and the deed was recorded, then, of course, the title would not be good, and no attorney would pass the title. While I would like to see a deed speak the truth, at the same time I do not believe that this Congress will be doing a wise or a judicious thing to enact such a provision as is proposed in this bill. However, I want to repeat that the purpose of the proposed legislation, to make deeds speak the exact truth as to consideration of sale, is a worthy

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield me the balance of his time?

Mr. BRYAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts the balance of my hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 55 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to be recognized just at present.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Washington properly construes this bill. It does not outlaw the deed; the bill does not make the deed invalid; it simply provides that it shall not be admitted to record unless the true consideration is fixed in the deed.

Mr. BRYAN. I will ask the gentleman if a deed that is not allowed to be recorded is not outlawed? How would you outlaw a deed?

Mr. SISSON. Between the parties the deed would be perfectly good. The grantor in the first instance might sell the property to an innocent purchaser a second time, and if the innocent purchaser complied with the law and had no knowledge of the existence of the first deed and put it on record, his title would be good. That would be the result that would follow in any State where a man negligently fails to put his deed on record and the grantor makes a second deed to an innocent purchaser who does put it on record.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman allow me a further suggestion? It would also give the right to persons who extended credit to the owner of record to step in between the real owner and the person who appeared to be the owner of record?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. And would it not do this, that where the record showed that a person was the owner and that no transfer had been made, a person who would extend the credit to a person who appeared to be the owner would have the right to enforce his claim against that property?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely, that would be the result of a failure to comply with the statute to give proper notice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think this bill has no difficulty that all State statutes do not present. The rule in relation to liens on real estate exists in nearly every State in the Union. presume that any man in any other State in the Union would purchase land in my State until he had first ascertained what the laws were and investigated fully the question as to whether or not he would get a good title before he paid his money for it. A foreigner buying land in the District of Columbia must buy it with notice of all the statutes that exist in reference to real estate. If a man wants to buy land in Massachusetts, he must buy the land in accordance with the Massachusetts The only question to be determined is whether or not this statute requires men to deal fairly and honestly with each other. It is an evil, and a very great evil, I think, for men to understate the true valuation of a piece of real estate in a deed. not know but that the committee might have been warranted in going further and stating that if one states in a deed of conveyance that a greater consideration was paid than that actually paid, that that fact must be stated in the affidavit, because it is like watering stock. I know of a great many instances in my own State where men who are in the real estate business, who buy land in my State or who have the right to sell it, will agree with the grantor of the land that the consideration shall be a certain amount of money. He then takes the deed himself and sells it to another party at a very much greater amount. one case in mind where a partner in the purchase of a piece of property agreed that the consideration should be about $20,000 more than what was actually paid. He took the $20,000 from his partners, and the consideration stated in the face of the deed was $20,000 more than what the original granters actually received from him. Therefore, from every angle that you may look at this proposition, it seems to me that it is one that brings about justice, that brings about honesty and fairness, and does no injury or harm to anyone who wants to do right and deal fairly with the public.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SISSON. Certainly. Mr. CULLOP. I call the attention of the gentleman to the clause on page 2, commencing with line 3:

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

Does the gentleman think that that is a proper matter to be placed in this bill?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely, I think it is properly there. Mr. CULLOP. That will only apply to the consideration paid for the property?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. In other words, if I buy a piece of property from the gentleman, he ought to state in the deed that he makes the exact amount that I am to pay for the land. These public records, in other words, ought to state the truth. No public record ought to be permitted to enable any man to perpetrate a fraud either upon the Government or upon the people buying the land.

Mr. CULLOP. There is no danger of that ever being construed, in the event the property advances in value, so as to prevent a lien for a greater amount being enforced?

Mr. SISSON. No; this is, where the minds shall have met and the consideration is agreed upon and they have reduced it to writing in the form of a deed, and where that deed is properly acknowledged, that the true consideration or the cause of the meeting of the minds shall be stated in the deed that goes on record.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Stated succinctly and tersely, the object of this bill is simply that the deed shall state the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth to entitle it to registration?

Mr. SISSON. That is it.

Mr. SIMS. But the validity of the title to land does not depend on registration.

Mr. SISSON. You may have deeds of record that are fraudulent. Fraud is so varied in its forms that no legal writer has ever yet undertaken to define a fraud. Therefore, a deed which is fraudulent, which goes on record, may be attacked in a court of chancery. This does not mean that a man's title is absolutely good because he has a deed of record.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose the deed is made for love and affection. Does the gentleman then think that the grantors could make an affidavit that there is no other consideration paid?

Mr. SISSON. That will be all that is necessary.
Mr. DILLON. And, therefore, if you wanted to create a lien in the same instrument for $3,000 against the grantee, would not this make it unlawful for him to do so?

Mr. SISSON. It would not.

Mr. DILLION. I think it would.
Mr. SISSON. I think not. Just state the true consideration and the true contract in the deed.

Mr. DILLON. But he makes an affidavit that the grantee accepts the property for love and affection, and in this deed there is a clause that the grantee shall pay him the sum of $500 or $1,000 within a number of years. Now, would not this provision destroy the vitality of the deed?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely not.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, the gentleman says, in the clause alluded to by Mr. CULLOP:

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien upon the property—

And so forth.

Now, the gentleman is fully aware that a man often dies and leaves real estate a part of which, on his executors transferring that real estate for the benefit of one of the heirs, is subject to the provisions, and yet there is no consideration for the receiv-What would the gentleman say in a ing of that real estate. case of that kind-

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is, by will.

Mr. GARDNER. It says grantor and does not say vendor. Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Grantor, not by a deed of convevance

Mr. SISSON. This bill, as I understand it, is confined to deeds, not to wills or bequests.

Mr. GARDNER. You get a deed from the executor-

Mr. SISSON. If it is in carrying out a trust under a will or by virtue of a decree of court, it would only be necessary for the executor to make a deed and state the real consideration.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman should say "in consideration of the execution of any such aforesaid deed" in line 3, just as it is in line 6.

Mr. SISSON. I do not see there can be a particle of harm in

Mr. GARDNER. What the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cullor] said impressed me. I should say that you ought to insert as an amendment, after the word "consideration," in line 3, the words "for the execution of any such aforesaid deed."

Mr. SISSON. In reference to the question of trust, if a man in his will, which he seals up and the world knows nothing about it, has made a bequest of property to his children with a certain burden upon it, why, the only thing necessary would be to have that will taken to probate, and after it is probated, then the device of land with a condition on it would simply be made by the executors of the will and placed on record reciting that it was the terms of the will, and in the preparation of the deed of the executors it is always the safest and best practice not simply to sign it as the executor, but to set out in the deed on its face the fact that it is an execution of that trust, so that the abstractor in going through the record may see on the face of the deed just exactly the kind and character of title, and therefore I can see no excuse for any objection to the section to which the gentleman directs his criticism.

Mr. GARDNER. If the conveyance were made for nothing, it would be impossible at any future time to impose a trust or mortgage on that property.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think you can, anyhow.

Mr. GARDNER. But you can cure it by inserting the words in line 6.

Mr. SISSON. If the consideration of title was love and affection, you could not encumber it anyway.

Mr. GARDNER. They certainly can not encumber it the way you have got it drawn.

Mr. SISSON. If the deed is in fee simple for love and affection, he could encumber and sell it or do as he pleases. If there is a limitation placed in the construction of the deed, it would be controlled by the limitation; but the deed itself must state not only the consideration under this bill, but it will have to state the other facts, and if a man wants to control that real estate he would be compelled to put all the conditions in his deed if he wants the conditions complied with. A man may deed his children land and put in the deed the condition that they shall pay an annual rental of $500 a year for love and affection. He deeds the land on the condition, however, that they pay him $500 a year.

You would simply state the consideration and the deed. And without that clause, from lines 1 to 3 inclusive, in the bill you might falsely state that the consideration was greater than it actually was, and therefore perpetrate a fraud.

Mr. BRYAN. Referring to these particular lines-

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

Suppose a real estate agent buys some property from some person who is not very well up in the usages, and not very well accustomed to conveyancing, for $1,000, we will say, $100 cash and $100 a month, and this real estate agent prepares a deed which stipulates "$100 consideration" and prepares a little pro forma affidavit, and the party signs the deed to him for $100, and then he gives back a mortgage for $900, and he then sells the property to somebody else. It is true that the affidavit did not speak the truth and the woman, or other unsuspecting person who conveyed it, signed it for $100, when, in truth, it was $1,000, owing to the ability of the real estate agent to work that vendor; and then he sells the property to somebody else and here is a $900 mortgage against it. Would not that $900 mortgage be worthless?

Mr. SISSON. That real estate man ought to be put in the penitentiary

Well, we are not talking about the penitentiary. Mr. BRYAN.

Mr. SIMS. It would not be invalid as between the parties.
Mr. SISSON. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] has just stated, it would be perfectly good between the parties, but if those people who buy lands rely absolutely upon the man who sells the land and his representations they will always get into trouble. Take the present land laws in the District of Columbia; and if the party is dishonest he may perpetrate frauds upon you under any condition. But, as the gentleman states, cases where men may perpetrate frauds upon people are infinitesimally less than the frauds that are being actually practiced upon everybody now with reference to false recital of consideration in the deed.

Mr. CULLOP. I think I can answer the gentleman's question as to that satisfactorily. In the case that you put he could sue the person who made the deed and recover a judgment for his $900, but he could not under this provision enforce a lien on the property.

Mr. BRYAN. Just exactly. And all a scheming real estate agent would want to do would be to tell the woman that was signing the deed for $100 that it was all right, and then he would go to work and execute a mortgage for $100 a month, or $900 in all, to the party that made the deed, and he sells the whole thing and gets out, and the woman who is relying on this $900 mortgage loses it because of this real estate man, who got her to sign for $100.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. SISSON. I must decline to yield further, because I believe that the case is one that might occur at any time now in case you are dealing with a rascal. If you are dealing with a man that is going to defraud you, it can be done under the present law. We must presume under the law that parties who transact business under that law know the law. It is an axiomatic proposition that you must know the law. Under the present laws of all the States of the Union, so far as I know, and it was the English common law, passed, however, as a statute-but a part of the common law-that after they established deeds of record, an innocent purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice, buying land, when the vendor has the title on the record, if he gets to the courthouse first and puts it on record, successfully defrauds, not intentionally, not knowingly-but the vendor knows it-successfully defrauds the innocent or unwary who fails to put his deeds upon record.

Now, if you shall decline to pass a law to compel honest consideration in deeds, because you can conceive a case where men may deceive the unwary and the weak, then you abolish all law. There could be no law, because all law is a lot of technical rules. There is a set of rules for the acquisition of real estate. And when you follow these rules you get a good title, and when you do not you do not get a good title. And land law, like all other laws, is nothing more than man-made rules for the purpose of determining the question of title to a piece of property, so that civilization may transact business and all may transact their business in accordance with the same rule.

Mr. McKENZIE, Mr. Chairman, I did not have the pleasure of hearing the beginning of the gentleman's statement in regard to his bill. I would like to ask him what is the wrong sought to be remedied by this legislation?

Mr. SISSON. Stating false considerations. In other words, for a piece of property worth $10,000 the deed merely recites the language, "For and in consideration of $10."

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, then, so far as the people of the United States are concerned, and the people generally of the District of Columbia, is that such a wrong that we should take cognizance of it?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely. Mr. McKENZIE. And place ourselves in the position of guardians over these men?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman evidently did not hear the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Johnson of There are various reasons why this should be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me cite one instance of where fraud grew out of this

Mr. SISSON. Yes. Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is an instance that has been pretty well established, where a relative of an old woman advised her to sell a property. She accepted his advice and sold to the agent of the relative who was giving her this advice. A consideration of $10 was recited, though the property really sold for several thousand dollars. Then a deed of trust was sold for several thousand dollars. Then a deed of trust was put on for another misrepresented sum, and in that way the old woman was chiseled out of her property, whereas if the real consideration had been recited there could have been no lien on the property beyond that which was recited. Then this fraudulent transaction would have been prevented.

Mr. SISSON. In further answer to the gentleman's question, Mr. Chairman, I will say that the income-tax law which is now upon the statute books will be more perfectly enforced in reference to real-estate transactions in the District of Columbia; and if the States of the Union will do the same thing we would have a more perfect enforcement of the income-tax law.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me—

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is this law prepared merely on account of this transaction that the gentleman from Kentucky cites?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There are other cases. Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman think it would be good policy to burden the alienation of real estate in the manner here provided?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois has the wrong idea. Instead of its burdening the alienation of real estate, this bill removes many burdens from it. The way they do it now is to recite a nominal consideration and then execute an entirely different set of papers.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Is this bill drafted in conformity with the statute of some particular State?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman. yield to me?

Mr. SISSON. In just one moment.

Mr. GARDNER. But the committee considered the pro-priety of prescribing the form of that statement of the grantor in the statute?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.
Mr. GARDNER. And decided not to do it?
Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Decided not to do what?

Mr. GARDNER To prescribe the statement of the grantor in the statute itself?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That was left to the discretion of the individual making the affidavit, the substance only being required to be set out.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a

Mr. SISSON. In a moment. Mr. Chairman, I want to finish my remarks, and then I will yield to anybody who wants time.
Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question that I want to suggest to him?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. A great many deeds are made "for considerations of love and affection.'

Mr. SISSON. Yes. That was stated a moment ago. It would only be necessary to recite that.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the provisions of this bill would not people escape the estimates of value by making deeds on consideration of love and affection?

Mr. SISSON. Not without subjecting themselves to all the pains and punishments of perjury. It is true you can not make men tell the truth by requiring them to tell the truth but you can make a law and require them to comply with it or else commit perjury.

Now, the common practice, I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie], in States which do not have some such statute as this in order that people may conceal the true consideration is to say, "For and in consideration of the sum of $10 in cash paid and for other considerations I hereby convey and warrant the following described property.
"other considerations" are not recited in the deed. They sometimes say, "For and in consideration of the sum of $10 and for the considerations recited in a collateral agreement made at the same time and place with this agreement, which said colleteral agreement is hereby made a part of this deed.

Now, they do not have to put all those agreements upon the Therefore they keep out of the record the true consideration and the entire transaction, and you will find that a deed will frequently be left in such a condition that after the transaction is completed they do not go and mark upon the margin of the record the satisfaction of these other considerations or the statement of these other considerations, and a man never knows when he gets a good title to a piece of property. For that reason my State requires that when a piece of land is alienated, and a man has received payment upon a deed of trust which has been recorded, the man who receives the payment must instantly have the fact recorded to show that the obligation is satisfied; and if he does not do that he is subject to all the damages that may accrue to the party who is thereby injured. For that reason all the records in my State are cleaned up immediately after these obligations and these collateral agreements are satisfied. In that way titles are cleared up and made plain. I regret very much that my State does not require the true consideration to be recited, because that requirement would make the records of the State concerning real estate transactions recite the facts in reference to those transactions. The man who wants to do right, the man who wants to deal honestly with his fellows, the man who wants to deal fairly with everyone with whom he has business transactions, can have no objection to stating the true consideration. I do not believe that the records of any county in any State or the records of the District of Columbia or any Territory ought to state falsely or incompletely or imperfectly the nature of the transaction. The deed ought to state the whole transaction, and withhold nothing from the public and withhold nothing from future purchasers of the land.

Mr. GARDNER. If I were selling the gentleman a carload of oats, would the gentleman think that the public had a right to know what the price was?
Mr. SISSON. Not necessarily.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman says it is not honest to withhold the true consideration.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman sells me a carload of oats it is no other man's business, but when you deal with real estate you are dealing with an entirely different kind of transaction. Every man who deals with real estate ought to deal with it in accordance with the laws of the land, and that is what we are after now. I would have no objection to a statute requiring that the true consideration in a sale of personal property be required to be stated, if other people might be affected by the transaction. In other words, I have no desire to conceal the facts, even in reference to transfers of personal property. I feel that the world would be infinitely better off if every man dealt the cards above the table, anyway. I am getting rather tired of this idea that business should be conducted in secret. I do not believe in secret manipulations between nations. believe that the old secret manipulations of kings through diplomatic channels spread woe and misery upon the earth. believe the manipulations in reference to business through banking channels have enabled some men to amass much more than they ought to have. I believe that the transaction of business ought all to be in the open. I know that sometimes men would not be enabled to make the vast profits they have made, but the past history of the English-speaking people has been a history of publicity in reference to transactions involving real estate.

The earth, as nearly as it is possible for any element to do so, involves the very life of the individual, the very life of his family, and the very life of the Nation. The land was not made by man, but by the Creator. By man-made rules we have permitted one man to run a line around a piece of land, and then, by going and filing first with the Federal Government, to obtain a patent to the land; and the public by common consent have permitted him to segregate that land from the remainder of the public domain, and then the public have permitted the man who acquired the land in that manner to sell it or bequeath it. Unquestionably when you deal with the title to the earth's surface, it ought to be honestly and fairly dealt with, and when the title is transferred the law requires that a record of the transfer shall be made in order that a good and perfect title may pass. Now, what is the purpose of that? Why are you required to put your deed on record at all? Even before the days of writing, under the English common law, why was it that all the vassals and all the neighborhood were called together, and those living upon the land were called together, and the man alienating the land took a clod of dirt or a twig or something, in the presence of all the people, and said that he passed the title? That was done in the presence of the witnesses. Why was that done? It was because of the fact that they had no records in those days, and it was so that the whole community and everyone in the neighborhood might know that the title had been transferred and might know who was the owner of the land. Now we have substituted for that custom the title deed, and the controlling factor is the record of that deed.

And since the law is that a man to get a good title should put the deed on record, while we are making that law why not require him to put the proof in the record and tell the facts about the real estate? The three things essential to man's existence are air, water, and land. If a man could by some fiendish instrument arrange to gather all the air so that he might deal it out to the human family, a breath at a time, or if he could make some hellish receptacle where he could catch all the water and deal it out to the parched and thirsty people, he would be destroyed instantly, because the human family would not permit it. And yet, the earth and the land is just as essential to human existence. It is, in my judgment, important that all the transactions in reference to real estate, since the public by common consent have agreed to these rules, that the record shall speak the truth and nothing but the truth. I can not see after a careful reading of the bill anything in it but that is good. I can see absolutely no reason why a man shall not comply with this additional rule in reference to the acquisition and alienation of real estate in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GARDNER. Will not the gentleman allow me to make use of a little time on this side?

Mr. SIMS. I do not expect to use the whole 10 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. I believe two gentlemen on that side of the House have an hour apiece. The chairman has reserved the balance of his time, and the gentleman from Mississippi has an hour.

Mr. SISSON. I took it for the purpose of yielding to the gentleman from Tennessee, who wanted time, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. George], a member of the committee, who wanted some time.

Mr. GARDNER. I did not know whether the gentleman wanted to use all of his time in succession.

Mr. SISSON. I have no desire as to the order in which the speeches are made.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the two gentlemen on my left, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Roberts] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Bryan], have discussed lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 2, of the bill. If that is looked to closely, it will be seen that it reads as follows:

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

That only applies to the excess over the real consideration and has no effect whatever upon the deed or the true consideration. But if the land should be sold for $10,000 and the deed expressed $20,000 and note taken for $10,000, a lien would be only good for $10,000, just the excess, and only the excess, and that would not affect the title a particle.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. In the case just cited of the absolute sale and note given, how does a note itself become a lien on the property?

Mr. SIMS. If the deed expresses on its face that the property is paid for and note given, why, of course, as between the purchaser and the holder of the note they are good without registration—good in any State.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. But the gentleman is speaking of a lien, and I wanted to know how a note could be a lien.

Mr. SIMS. It would not as to a third party or a judgment creditor, but would between the parties.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I did not know that a note was ever a lien on real estate.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will read, in connection with that, lines 6 to 9, page 2, he will see that it is in direct contradiction to what the gentleman has just said.

Mr. SIMS. I am coming to that.

Mr. CULLOP. It reads:

Nor shall any consideration for the execution of any such aforesaid deed, which is greater than the consideration mentioned therein, be collectible or enforcible in any court of law or equity.

Now, while that provision remains in there you can not recover a personal judgment against the purchaser, the vendor could not, and he could not collect it in court. Under the above paragraph he could enforce judgment against the purchaser, so that is absolutely nullified.

Mr. SIMS. That is the very thing that I am going to discuss. Lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 must be read in connection with lines 3, 4, and 5:

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

of conveyance.

Nor shall any consideration for the execution of any such aforesaid deed, which is greater than the consideration mentioned therein, be collectible or enforcible in any court of law or equity.

It is the excessive consideration that you can not collect. It does not say that you can not collect the real consideration. It is the excess of consideration above that mentioned in the deed. That is, the excess could not be collected; not the note that may have the excess in it, but you can only collect the amount of the real consideration.

For instance, if one note covered the whole consideration, and another was given for an amount in excess of the whole consideration, and the first note was fully collected, you could not collect the second one anywhere. Taking them together, I do not see any cloud at all in the way.

not see any cloud at all in the way.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Take lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, page 2. Suppose the consideration expressed in the deed is $1 and the real consideration $10,000?

Mr. SIMS. Then what? What does the gentleman want to know?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. And suppose the note was given under the gentleman's theory?

Mr. SIMS. What note—a note for $9,999? Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. What does the gentleman want to ask about it? Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Could that be collected?

Mr. SIMS. As between the parties?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. As between the parties;

Mr. BRYAN. Or suppose the first note was transferred to an innocent party?

Mr. SIMS. He could not be an innocent party in the face of the recorded deed, beyond the facts stated in the deed. That is the object of registration-that people who are not parties to it may know what relations exist between the parties to the deed-and the parties to the deed are estopped from setting up any other conditions as to third parties without notice.

Mr. BRYAN. Suppose the Riggs National Bank were to buy the note for $9,999, then Mr. Glover would lose it?

Mr. SIMS. If he owns the whole stock of the bank he would. Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Could the $9,999 note be

As against the maker? Mr. SIMS.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. That presents another question. Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Does not this prohibit it

Mr. SIMS. Because the maker has been guilty of an unlawful act; and if he goes into court, he must go in with clean So, if the maker was to go into court to enforce an unlawful note, he might fail.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. The gentleman stated a moment ago that-

Mr. SIMS. The other is for the excess.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. These was $10,000 in the case he cited, one note that covered the real consideration and another note of $10,000 excess. I understood the gentleman to say that this law would prevent any recovery on the $10,000 note which was excess?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I am getting at the case where the consideration named in the deed was $1 and the real consideration was $9,999. Can you recover on that?

Mr. SIMS. The lines to which I refer, being from 3 to 10, inclusive, cover cases of excessive-consideration notes. The question I am answering is where the consideration motes. The question I am answering is where the consideration mentioned is above the actual consideration. The excess can not be collected, but the gentleman asked a different question entirely, not involved in those lines at all. Those lines of the bill deal with a case where there has been a note given for an excess. The gentleman's question is where a deed has been made in violation of the law; that is, that the person has signed the deed and sworn falsely that $1 was all of the consideration that he received. Does the gentleman believe any man who will swear that way ought to be entitled to recover one cent anywhere over and above the amount he swore he actually received?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think he would or ought to, but that does not arise by reason of the other sections of the bill at all. The lines to which I refer have reference to where a consideration in excess of the real consideration has been given. The gentleman's question is where the consideration is less than the real consideration, and he has sworn falsely. Then he can not go into court and collect it.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Has not the gentleman in mind in the course of his argument mortgage notes, not notes that may be given as part of the purchase price?

Mr. SIMS. It makes no difference. A lien retained in the face of the deed for any part of the purchase price is in the nature of a mortgage. If a deed is made and the grantor professes to receive payment in full, although not a cent has been paid, as between third parties, like judgment creditors, or purchasers without notice, the lien would be absolutely void, although there was not a cent of the original purchase price But where the deed itself says so much paid cash and so much in notes to be paid retaining a lien for the payment of the notes as herein recited, that is as good as an absolute mortgage. It gives notice to everybody when it is recorded.
Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. What about the m

What about the mortgage notes?

Mr. SIMS. They are part of the deed, expressed in the conditions of it.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It is a mortgage; I consider it a conveyance

Mr. SIMS. It is a conveyance the same as a deed is a conveyance. What is it?
Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. A reservation.

Mr. SIMS. Is the gentleman a lawyer? Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I an I am

Mr. SIMS. What does the gentleman define a mortgage to be if not a conditional deed?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Yes,

Mr. SIMS. Now, the law applies to both just alike as to registration and notice.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will pardon me, there is a difference between the conveyance that is in effect a mortgage and a conveyance which purports to carry a title without any reservation whatever, and if there is so much cash and notes to be paid in the future, would that constitute a lien on the property-

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely; if it is so expressed in the face of the deed.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Now, I ask the gentleman if those notes are a lien on the land?

Those notes are not a lien and never have been.

unless retained in the face of deed.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman are they a lien? As a legal proposition are such notes a lien on the property? The gentleman knows what a lien is?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. How can those notes be incumbrances on property that is conveyed by a definite absolute

Mr. SIMS. As between the parties they are, but as to the third party they are not incumbrances or anything else. That is what we have got the registration law for; that you must not make these secret liens in deeds and cause parties to give credit upon the faith of property not fully paid for.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Suppose there was a case where notes were taken instead of cash and nothing in the deed to show there was any lien whatever, does the gentleman mean to say if the notes are not paid the grantor can take back his property and foreclose the mortgage;

Mr. SIMS. The bill provides that the deed must show what the consideration really was—

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. The gentleman is wandering afield-Mr. SIMS. And I take it that the man who purchases and the man who makes the deed must state the true amount of the purchase price.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, This whole argument started by my asking the gentleman if he considered notes a lien on real estate; that is, notes given for the purchase price. I wanted to find out what sort of notes he was talking about. Now I find out it is mortgage notes-

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired,

Mr. SIMS. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield the gentleman two min-

Mr. SIMS. In my State the lien notes between the purchaser and the seller of real estate for which the notes are given are not required to be registered, although the deed must be reg-

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Well, we do in my State. Mr. SIMS. But they may be good between the parties. if not registered, a judgment creditor of the seller may levy on the land and sell it or fasten an attachment on it. But if it is registered, all parties are affected with whatever is contained in the deed; and if that deed shows unpaid purchase money for which a lien is retained on the land a judgment creditor can not sell the land, except subject to the lien deed, whatever it may be.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is the law of his State with regard to the lien between the grantor and grantee the law in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SIMS. I have not looked it up, and therefore I do not know.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. This bill applies to the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMS. There is a difference between liens. A lien where it is not retained in the deed is in the nature of an equity in my State before any other encumbrance is fastened upon it. This bill, as I understand it, has no other object or purpose in view than to perfect the registration of instruments so as to give an expression of the truth. As the gentleman has shown here, and as you know, you can buy a piece of land worth $10,000 and take a deed for it for $10. The assessor knows nothing about the value of the land unless he is acquainted with the land in that immediate neighborhood. He must make an inquiry, but if the true consideration was put in the deed at the start, such inquiry would not be necessary. You could not rely on the deed for value—
Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Can you, anyway?

Mr. SIMS. You can rely on it so far as it goes. A false consideration can be named. The very object of this bill is to prevent a false consideration. The object and purpose of the bill, as stated by the chairman, seems to be in the direction of public benefit and good public policy.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does the gentleman contend that the assessing officer in making his assessment for taxation would be bound by the consideration stated in that deed?

Mr. SIMS. Not at all. The assessments are made only every three years. If you are assessing property on K Street or any other street, the assessor every three years looks to the sales and compares them with the former assessment, and if the deeds express the real consideration he can at once see whether the trend of prices is upward or downward.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But if he undertakes them in the way the gentleman suggests he ought to, you would have as many men assessing property and the judgment of as many men prevailing as there are parties to the deeds.

Mr. SIMS. I never thought of saying that he should be bound by the sales alone; that the assessor be bound absolutely by the deed, whether it be true or false-

Mr. IGOE. I might say that in the hearings before the committee the district assessor said that this would be of great aid to him. 'He said it would help him greatly in his work, and so did the commissioners.

Mr. SIMS. Of course, it can be done like the chairman said, by giving a mortgage for the balance, which requires registration and all that kind of thing. I think this is a good bill. think that the object and purpose of it is good, and that the results of it will be of greater benefit than any possible evil that will grow out of it. It will prevent many evil practices which are now resorted to. I know there are real estate men who do not want this. For instance, if I have a block here with 50 lots in it, I can sell a lot to you for $1,000, and everyone would know what I sold that lot for. If I want to sell one right by the side of it for less money, no deed being registered, I am not embarrassed by saying I got too high a price or too low a price, one or the other. It makes real estate trading easier-a great deal easier-if no consideration is required to be stated in the deed.

And now, to show the gentleman what false statements are made in deeds, and what a temptation there is to overstate the consideration, where that is the object and purpose that is tried to be accomplished, I will say, as to the value of the land in my own county and my own State, that there used to be a great deal of timbered land in large bodies of 5,000 acres. Some man, who was a trickster, in company with other tricksters, got into the habit of mutually conveying these lands to one another at enormous considerations and going up North or somewhere where people knew nothing about the facts and exhibiting these deeds, and they often sold these lands at enormously high prices over the real value, until finally we passed a law in Tennessee by which they had to name the real consideration, or state it in such a way that the register would know the value of the land. The register, an officer called the here, was required to collect the taxes at the value set out in the deeds. Then, the northern people got honest deeds from that time on.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman states that that is in the law of Tennessee?

Yes. Mr. SIMS.

Mr. BRYAN. Is the State of Tennessee now making a similar

Mr. SIMS. Not exactly in this form. Our register of deeds there-who is called the recorder here-is required to collect the State and county taxes upon land conveyed by nonresident owners. The way they used to do it was to send in the deeds and have them registered and then have them sent back, and they would send in a deed providing for a consideration as having passed that was three or four or five times, or maybe twenty times, the real value in order to unload it on some unsuspecting party at a distance from there. We made them pay the tax on the value named in the deed.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not rather a singular instance that the people of Tennessee, being so honest, and known to be such all over the world, would make such a law as that apply only to nonresidents?

Mr. SIMS. The men who were doing this conveying were, most of them, nonresidents, and most of them lived north of the Ohio River.

Mr. BRYAN. But you applied that law only to nonresidents? Mr. SIMS. Yes and no; but residents have no such motive to do it. They are known there, and their character would be at stake

The question here arises in connection with the assessment of property every three years. If this bill is enacted, the assessors will know what has been the progress of values in a particular section. All they will have to do will be to look at the deeds of lands sold since last assessment. The affidavit, it seems to me, ought to be contained in the deed, so that every time a person was able to sign a deed he would sign the affidavit, because it will be a part of it, and the officer who will make the certificate will be an officer authorized to administer oaths.

I do not see how this can be objected to, except by people who want to sell property for more than it is worth without its being known, or by people who want to sell property for less than it is worth without that fact being known.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. George] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

GARDNER] want to take some time now?

Mr. GARDNER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts IMr. GARDNER] will be recognized for 55 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I will await the return of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Johnson] to the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE] will be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the most important aspect of this bill has not yet been considered, and that is that it will afford a proper basis for assessment and taxation of real estate in the District of Columbia, which the District is now without.

The assessor has now largely to guess at values. He must see some values somewhere; he must find them somewhere; and the present assessor has for years been asking for help such as would be brought by this act. Assessors in other parts of the United States are asking for the same kind of help, and the best kind of information about real-estate values in the District of Columbia and elsewhere is to be afforded by what Adam Smith called the "higgling of the market."

The consideration of these real-estate transfers, if recorded, could be made a source of information-on the whole, exact information. If a penalty were to be put upon the kind of information that is recorded, so that a man were more exact in recording the true consideration, the assessor in the District of Columbia would have some real facts as to values of real estate in the District of Columbia, and upon those facts he could proceed to make an assessment throughout the District.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I am asking for information. Can the assessor of the District of Columbia under the law place any value he sees fit upon any given piece of real

Mr. GEORGE. He puts a value upon a piece of property, based upon what he believes to be its selling price, and the owner of the property can appeal from that valuation.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. When that appeal comes the assessor has power to get some facts as to the real value of the property by putting him under oath and asking its value from him?

Mr. GEORGE. No. He can only take the affidavit of the owner when he comes before him.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I understand; but at that point the assessor can get some very accurate information as to the value of that piece of property.

Mr. GEORGE. Why should not the assessor have it in the first instance rather than have his office encumbered?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Simply because the assessor has it in his power to put on any value he sees fit, and the owner will not protest unless he gets a valuation higher than the real value. Then the true value comes out.

Mr. GEORGE. The fact of the matter is that the assessor has specifically asked for this true-consideration information. The request has appeared in his annual reports, and he has appeared before the District Committee several times and requested it. We had a very extensive examination into this whole matter of assessment and taxation of real estate last

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment while I put to him a case that happened to come under my own observation?
Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I state this for the purpose of asking how the assessor would have been benefited by the information. A man who had been a residuary legatee of a large estate comprising a great deal of real estate in the city of Washington, left the city, and before leaving he disposed of all his real estate holdings except one piece. That piece he had on the market, we will say, at $20,000. He could not get a sale of it at $20,000, but he was offered half that amount, and in order to close it out and get rid of all his holdings in the city of Washington, he sold it at a great sacrifice at $10,000. Now, assuming that that consideration had been stated in the deed, what information of any real value would it have conveyed to the assessor? There was a piece of property sacrificed under peculiar conditions.

Mr. GEORGE. In that particular case it might not have given any helpful information to the assessor.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. If that consideration had been stated in the deed, would not the effect on the assessor's mind have been to depreciate the value of the adjoining property :

Mr. GEORGE. Not necessarily. The assessor is free— Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. If he made any use of the facts in the deed, it seems to me it must have that effect.

Mr. GEORGE. The assessor has repeatedly asked for the passage of this bill, and has said it would help him. He ought to be the judge of what will help him in the discharge of his functions. Not only has the assessor here in the District of Columbia asked it, but the president of the board of tax com-missioners of New York came before this committee last year and said this principle would be of the greatest assistance in the matter of assessing real estate everywhere. He wanted a similar law for the State of New York, and is making an effort to get it enacted there. There are many parts of the country in which this matter is now coming up, and my own judgment from an examination of the matter here in the District is that the passage of this simple act would do more to stop scandals in assessing real property in the District of Columbia than anything else.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. George] as much of my time as he desires.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the gentleman,

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is recognized in this House and otherwhere as an authority on real estate matters. Can he inform the House whether there is any other instance where a provision similar to this has been enacted into law?

Mr. GEORGE. I can not, Mr. Speaker. An act similar to this was carried through one branch of the Pennsylvania Legislature, I am informed, although I have not seen the act and can not tell whether it embodies exactly the same principle. The Canadians are working upon the principle, also, and under the present liberal government the taxing experts are working upon this principle in London; but I can point to no act anywhere precisely in the terms of the bill here being considered. That, however, should not be an argument against it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then this bill is original, so far as its phraseology is concerned, not having been copied from any other similar statute previously considered in any other legis-

Mr. GEORGE. I presume it is. Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will pass. I think it will be in the interest of good business in the District of Columbia. The District Committee of the House had a long hearing upon it. Many of those interested in real estate in the District of Columbia were heard, and my own observation was that those who seemed to be opposed to it were men who did not want to have light thrown upon real estate transactions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. GEORGE. With pleasure.
Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think the object sought can be accomplished by the passage of the act leaving out the affidavit feature of it?

Mr. GEORGE. No; that seems to me to be necessary. Mr. MADDEN. That seems to impose a great burden on a lot of people who are not familiar with the laws of the District of Columbia

Mr. GEORGE. I can not see why a man should not make an affidavit upon a matter so important to the public as that.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not become a part of the deed, does it? Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. Mr. MADDEN. And it is not recorded. Why should it be a part of the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to answer why I think it should be a part of the law? Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This statement is required to be sworn to.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I know that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And the bill requires that the paper when sworn to shall be left with the recorder of deeds in his office as a part of his official records.

If it were on the deed, as soon as the deed is recorded then the deed is withdrawn by the grantee, who would take it and carry it away with him, and with it the affidavit on which a prosecution would have to be based.

Mr. MADDEN. But he would not take away the record. The record is there

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But that would not be the original paper.

Mr. MADDEN. If it was a part of the deed, it would become a part of the record.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There would be an additional fee, and if the original paper is kept in the office and not carried away by the man that carries away the deed you have a paper on which to base prosecutions for false swearing.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that the object sought to be accomplished by the committee could be as well accomplished without having any affidavit at all.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I will yield.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. As I read the bill, there will be required two fees for recording the deed of every piece of real estate conveyed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not understand it that way. Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman understand that the register, if that is the title of the recording officer, will place on his records any paper without making some charge for it? What is the charge for recording a deed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no provision in the bill for recording the affidavit; he keeps the original as a part of the files of his office.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Then, it is not the intention to have the affidavit recorded, but merely filed in the

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes: and preserved for future

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.
Mr. BRYAN. Suppose the affidavit on file was being examined by some man making an abstract so as to see that the law was complied with, and suppose some designing person examining the papers on file removes an affidavit to the deed of some important property whose title he would like to tie up, puts it in his pocket, and takes it away. What becomes of the title? It would lay a basis for some of his friends, perhaps, to make a good fee out of it at least.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I take it for granted that the recording of the paper would carry with it a prima facie case that the proper affidavit had been filed. The recording officer would not have recorded it unless it was. And if the gentleman from Washington undertakes now to fix it so that a fraud is impossible, I want to say that no such thing can be done. The man who would steal the affidavit would steal the record book in which the deed is recorded.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, that is not this proposition. Papers are oftentimes taken from the files.

He could tear a leaf out of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He could tear a leaf out of the record and put it in his pocket. Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Kentucky knows that unrecorded papers are frequently taken from the files.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To-day we have had two propositions before the House to deal with, one to suppress prostitution and the other to suppress fraud. They are the two hardest subjects on earth to grapple with, and we are compelled to have extreme measures in order to meet the things that we want to

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. COX. I have not paid a great deal of attention to this matter, but it looks to me like it would be a safer and sounder proceeding if the deed itself was sworn to. I do not believe that that would add very materially to the cost of the deed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That might require a man to swear to the description of the property by metes and bounds.

Mr. COX. I do not think so. I think in a short period of time blanks would be prepared with the oath on it relating to the sale and consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then when the deed was taken away the affidavit would go with it.

Mr. COX. But you would have it in the record.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think it better if the original paper be left on file.

Mr. COX. I am not clear on that point; I think the deed itself would be as good. What does it cost to record a deed in this District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It depends upon the length of

. They charge by the page. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I am ready to concede that there are advantages in having the real consideration set out in the deed. It will help the assessors to a certain extent, and that is all that the report claims that it will do. It will help the assessors. If it entailed no evil consequences, that would be a good thing, even though the help to the assessors might be very slight. But remember, Mr. Speaker, except when real estate is quickly changing hands the price of real estate in a deed of to-day is no indication of its value three or four years from now. In fact, what the Washington Board of Trade says in its eighteenth annual report would rather lead me to think that the bill was useless instead of thinking it is valuable. Except when a piece of real estate has very recently changed hands, the assessors' views as to the value of that real estate are infinitely more to be trusted if the assessors use their own judgment than they are if an out-of-date transaction is relied But, further than that, if this bill becomes a law an injustice is done to the vendors.

Most people speak as though prices were concealed by men in order to practice some chicanery. That is not the reason why men desire to conceal the prices at which they buy or sell or lease property. If I purchase a piece of real estate and make a bad bargain, nobody is going to help me out. If I purchase a piece of real estate and make a good bargain, and if I am obliged to have the true consideration shown the purchaser when I in turn have it for sale, he knows for what I can afford to sell it. In other words, he knows my lowest price and I have no means of knowing what he is willing to give. You have there a jug-handled trade. That is the reason why prices are concealed in the vast majority of transactions upon this earth.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that this requirement of reciting the true consideration in a deed is not operative in any State in the Union, but some one tells me that in the Etate of Arkansas there is a somewhat similar provision. I have been unable to verify that suggestion. It has not been so stated in the report, it has not been so stated on the floor. No one reading that report can find any reason for passing this bill except that in the case of real estate which has recently changed hands the assessors will have their task somewhat facilitated.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr.

MCLAUGHLIN1

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in all he has said in opposition to this measure. I admit that it is intended to accomplish and may accomplish, if enacted into law, some good. It might be helpful in a way to an assessing officer to know what real estate has sold for, and it may be helpful to the officer whose duty it is to collect the income tax. It may give some information by which to measure or ascertain the income of the individual against whom the tax should be assessed. Good things can be said concerning this bill, but in my judgment there is more fault than good in it. It would embarrass many people in their real estate transactions; it would compel them to make public their transactions and their dealings one with another in relation to matters in which the public is in no way interested except in the matter of assessing the property for taxation. We all know that real estate is bought and sold under all kinds of circumstances for all kinds of prices. Property is disposed of for all kinds of reasons, bought and sold for all kinds of reasons. Pieces of real estate are disposed of in trade one for another when it is almost impossible to tell what the real consideration of the transaction is, where one would be at a loss to state under oath the price or value in money that he is actually receiving for his property.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this would cause more trouble, inconvenience, annoyance, embarrassment-much of it absolutely unnecessary-than all of the good that it would do. compel people to lay bare transactions with which nobody except themselves have any business. I think there would be very little assistance to the assessing officer in making his assessment for taxation. He would be confused if he were to undertake to follow, in making his assessments, the recitals in deeds as to the consideration for which property had been sold.

He would be confused more than helped.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I was just wondering what this language meant, in lines 3, 4, and 5, page 2:

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be or become a lien on the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

I would like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks under that language it would be possible for a man to borrow money to put up a building on a piece of property here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that would embarrass him, and that many complications would arise on account of the lines that the gentleman from Illinois has read. I do not know what the law of the District of Columbia is in regard to liens on property created by deeds, but in the State that I come from there is no such thing. The only liens on real estate that are created by conveyance of property are made by mortgage, and there is no lien in favor of anyone connected with the transaction represented merely by deed of conveyance.

If one makes a deed, reciting a consideration, and takes no paper as evidence of security or lien upon the property, has no lien upon it. He can not go into court and claim a lien upon the real estate that he has disposed of by his deed; there must be a mortgage. Sometimes a contract is given, but the contract is really a deed and a mortgage together. Now, I think that the assessing officer who would have to depend to any considerable extent or would permit himself to depend to any considerable extent upon the recitals in deeds of conveyance, many of them executed years before assessment is made, to enable him to arrive at the value of property, or to make up his mind what property should be assessed at, does not know his business. I believe this evidence would be a confusion to him, would hurt more than help.

And now, while I am opposed to the entire bill, I would suggest that if it be passed it ought not to provide that a separate paper or a separate affidavit should be made to be filed in the office of the register of deeds with the deed and at the time the deed is filed for record. It seems to me that is altogether unnecessary. This bill might contain a provision which will unnecessary. This bill might contain a provision which will make a recital in the deed that the statement of the consideration is true and equivalent to an affidavit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARNER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I was going to suggest I yield three minutes to the gentleman—

Mr. GARDNER. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Forty minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. To whom was the gentleman from Kentucky about to yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES].

Mr. GARDNER. Then I wish to yield just a few minutes to Mr. Cullop. I am so far behind on my time that I would like to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] first.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the principle of this bill. As I understand it, it is to furnish information for the taxgatherer of the District of Columbia in order that he may obtain the real values of property in making assessments, but on reading the bill I think that the language does not express clearly the purpose of the bill. I want to call the attention of the chairman to page 2, commencing with

No consideration greater than that fully expressed in the conveyance shall be made or become a lien upon the property described in the said deed of conveyance.

I would like to suggest an amendment there, which I think will make certain the meaning of that clause. After the word "lien," in line 4, insert "for the purchase price or any part thereof." That would make certain that which is now uncertain in that paragraph and clearly define its meaning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I see no objection to that. Mr. CULLOP. When we come to that place in the consideration of the measure, I would like to suggest that amendment in the reading of the bill under the rule. Now, in the paragraph commencing with line 6-

Nor shall any consideration for the execution of any such aforesaid deed which is greater than the consideration mentioned therein be collectible or enforceable in any court of law or equity.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, that language should be eliminated from this bill. All the gentlemen who have spoken about this bill at the early stages of the consideration have construed the bill precisely different from what that language expresses the meaning to be. Every one of the gentlemen, the gentleman from Mississippi, the gentleman from Tennessee, suggest strongly on this floor in advocating this bill that as between the vendor and the vendee that if the proper consideration was not expressed in the deed the vendor could sue the vendee in a court and collect the difference. If this language is to be left, if this provision is to remain in this bill, it absolutely nullifies that proposition. It absolutely prohibits such an action. Now, what would be the effect if that language should remain in the bill? It destroys one of the best purposes of the bill. It absolutely eliminates from the bill an opportunity of discovery of the true transaction as far as practicable. This should be the case, but the avenue of exposure should be left open. If this is to remain in the bill, no vendor would ever sue a vendee for the purchase price other than that expressed in the bill, because the language of the law absolutely prohibits a recovery. It forbids the vendor from having any standing in court as against the vendee upon that proposition. Now, it would absolutely nullify one of the good purposes of this bill, and I am going to suggest an amendment to strike out, when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, because I think that language ought to be eliminated from the bill in order to make it effective and to carry out the most wholesome purpose for which it is intended.

If some vendor would express in his deed a consideration much smaller than the real consideration, and make his affidavit, he ought to have the right to go into court and enforce the real consideration. It ought not, though, to be made a lien upon the property. The paragraph just before that prevents it from being a lien. I am in favor of that paragraph, because that would prevent an injury to innocent purchasers and to innocent creditors. But if this other paragraph to which I have called the attention of the House is permitted to remain in the bill, it will not only do the public an injury, but will prevent the exposure of fraud, and also do an injury to the vendor of

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has

Mr. CULLOP. Now, I would like just one more minute on the last clause of the bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two

Mr. CULLOP. Now, I want to call attention to the penalty clause of the bill, as follows:

Any recording officer, deputy, or clerk who shall violate the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be removed from office, and in addition thereto pay a fine of $100.

I do insist that the word "knowingly" ought to be inserted in the paragraph, so that it would read:

Any recording officer, deputy, or clerk who knowingly shall violate the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be removed from office.

And so forth.

Now, the object of that is this: It is a well-settled principle of criminal law that you can not convict a person who commits an offense without the intention of violating the law, and unless you put in the word "knowingly" there you are simply going to destroy the effect of enforcing that provision of the

Suppose this kind of a case, namely, that an affidavit is given to the recorder of deeds purporting to set out the true con-sideration, but, in fact, it does not set it out, and it is false upon its face, and that recorder records that deed; under the penalty clause he would be subject to the penalty thereof. We ought not to do anything that would inflict a great injury upon a public officer who is honest and wants to do his duty, but if this remains as it is that will be its effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like recognition.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] to the fact that we are in the House and not in the Committee of the Whole, so there will be no consideration under the five-minute rule, and it will be necessary either for the gentleman from Kentucky to offer the amendments himself or withhold the previous question, so that the gentleman from Indiana may offer them or to vote down the previous question,

Now I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin

[Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is a meritorious one and I believe it should be passed by the House. It is intended as an aid to the assessors in arriving at the actual value of real estate. Persons who are acquainted with the method followed by assessors in determining valuation of property know that they always resort to the latest convey-ances of property in order to determine its valuation.

This is not any new measure, so far as the principle is con-cerned. Most of us will recall that at the time of the enforcement of the war-revenue act of 1898 the real consideration was required to be expressed in deeds of conveyances. Conveyances throughout the entire country conformed to the law, and the special stamp tax was levied based upon the real consideration.

Many of those who were then in practice will remember that we drew conveyances stating the actual consideration, for fear of infringing the Federal law. Any persons who are acquainted with the method of the assessment of real estate know that the assessors make inquiry about recent conveyances of real estate assessors make inquiry about recent conveyances of real estate so as to ascertain the value. What is the basis of taxation? It is the value of the property. Members here have referred to the fact that it is a matter in which the public is not interested, yet I can not conceive any question of taxation in which the public is more interested than in the proper and full valuation of real estate.

Here in the District of Columbia we know in many instances the property has not been assessed at its full value. But here is a means to that end. Are you going to aid the poor and small property owner, who generally states the right valuation in the deed, who does not know the tricks of the trade as to conveyances, or are you going to have him state the real valuation and not reach those who happen to make conveyances of large real estate properties?

Some objection has been made to other provisions of the bill as to the need of having this statement a part of the deed. As the chairman of the committee has expressed, there is no need for that statement being recorded.

All that is necessary, in my opinion, is the filing of the state-When the deed has once been recorded that completes the chain of title, and whether the statement is missing or not it matters little as to the chain of title in the subsequent succession of that property. If the Members of this House do not wish to aid the taxpayers of this District, to aid the people of this District in having their property properly assessed, then they should vote against this bill. But if they want to aid the people in obtaining a correct assessment of their property holdings, then this bill should be passed.

I am not saying that every provision in the bill has my unqualified support. The provision contained on page 2, between lines 6 and 9, is, I think, of doubtful propriety. I think that the full purpose of the law would be accomplished and a great step made in the right direction if that were eliminated, and I hope the chairman of the committee will see his way clear to move, or allow some other Member to move, to have that clause eliminated, so that there would not be any serious objection to the bill.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield to my friend from Nebraska. Mr. BARTON. In the case of trading properties how would the value be fixed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, if the gentleman has had any experience in the transfer of property, and I assume that he has, he will know that the vendor and the vendee always place a valuation upon their properties, and they would be required to state that value in the deed, as they would in any other ordinary transaction. A man has a piece of property valued at $4.000 and another man has a piece of property valued at $4,000; the first man is going to exchange his property with the other man for the other man's property plus $1,000. He states the real consideration in the deed. There is nothing intricate about that. It would apply to that case as to all other cases.

I think there are some Members here who are conjuring up some efroneous concepts as to the real scope and purpose of this bill.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do. Mr. GUERNSEY. Wor

Would not the exchange of property be advantaged if both sides agreed upon a low valuation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether they agreed upon a low valuation or not, under this bill they would have to state the real consideration, and there is always a real consideration in the case of a trade of property just as in the case of a direct sale. In the case of the direct sale you pay cash, and in the case of a trade you pay cash and some other property, or only some other property.

Mr. GUERNSEY. But the agreed valuation would be the consideration on the basis of exchange. Who could question whether it was a high or low valuation if it were stated by the parties?

Mr. STAFFORD. The parties, under the law, must state the real consideration. They could not exchange a piece of property worth $10,000 and say in the conveyance that it was worth only $1,000. The grantor would have to give the real consid-

Mr. GARDNER. I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin caught the question of the gentleman from Maine. Suppose I had a piece of real property worth $10,000 and the gentleman exchanged against that a piece of real estate worth $8,000, giving me $2,000 additional in cash, it would be just as much to our advantage to call the nominal prices $6,000 and $4,000, inasmuch as the gentleman would give $2,000 in exchange, and yet we would have evaded the purpose of this law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; you would evade it just as any other person would evade it by stating an erroneous consideration.

Mr. GARDNER. But it would not be perjury.
Mr. STAFFORD. It would amount to an evasion of this law. If the real price of exchange for a piece of land worth $10,000, on one side was another piece of land worth $8,000 and $2,000 cash, it would be my duty, if I were party to that transaction, to state that the consideration was $10,000.

Mr. MANN. The real consideration in the matter is the deed for the other property, is it not?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it is the property itself, not the deed. It is the property and the $2,000. That is the real consideration. The deed is only a piece of paper. The real consideration is the property itself. The deed is only the evidence of it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; what you get is the deed.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; what you get is the property.

Mr. MANN The gentleman is splitting hairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. No. I am speaking of the real substance, not the symbol.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I claim the floor. Mr. CULLOP. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. CULLOP.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman can not take me off my

The SPEAKER. That is true. The gentleman will proceed. Mr. GARDNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford], finding himself in somewhat of a hole, splits hairs as to whether a man receives the property or the deed for property. Now, the real consideration in an exchange is the exchange. The gentleman kept talking about putting in the real consideration. Is it to be put in that it is an exchange of

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would answer the gentleman by saying certainly so. The thing to do is to describe the two pieces of property, one of which is exchanged for the other.

Mr. MANN. What good will that do the assessor?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is one instance where the assessor would not be helped, and the only one that can be mentioned, I think.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that would be an entirely revolutionary proceeding as far as conveyancing is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I differ entirely with the gentleman. I have written many a deed of exchange where both pieces of property were set out in the deed, and A made grantor to B and then B made grantor to A of the property exchanged.

Mr. MANN. Of course that is perfectly permissible and is occasionally done, though I dare say it has not been done in Washington in 40 years. I do not think it has been done in my town in a longer time than that. It is revolutionary, as far as that is concerned. But I just took the floor to inquire whether that was covered by the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In my judgment the "real consideration" would require the two pieces of property exchanged

Mr. MANN. Where two men are trading property it will have to be set out as an exchange.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is my opinion, and I have often written deeds of that kind.

Mr. SIMS. Swapping land.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. How about love and affec-

Mr. MANN. Love and affection, of course, is always a consideration.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky wish to use any more time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I want to yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES]

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. Bryan] will close for our side. Does the gentleman from Kentucky expect to close for his side?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; I do.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Michigan now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES].

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Speaker, I speak as a man who has had seven years' experience as an assessing officer, and I want to say that an assessing officer in making his assessment will not consider simply one transaction. If he knows his business, he will keep records of the transfers of all property, putting down the sale price in different years so that he can trace the rise and fall of values in each part of the city and easier determine actual values at the time of each assessment. conceive why, if you require any consideration at all, you should not require the real consideration. If you put no consideration in a deed, the deed is valueless. If you put $10 consideration in the deed, it is a good one under our present law. Everybody knows that $10 is not the real consideration, and "$10" conveys no more idea of the real consideration than if no consideration was there at all. It is my judgment, after spending seven years in assessing property, that there is no one thing that would do more to equalize assessments than to require the real consideration for every sale.

When I say that, I recognize the fact that sales may be made at less than value and at more than value; but the assessing officer, taking into account the various sales in a neighborhood, can readily arrive at the actual value and can form some judgment of the rise and fall of values in the part of the city under consideration. I can see no harm to the vendor that a would-be buyer should know what was originally paid for the piece of property, and in doing that I recognize the fact that values rise and fall. The only objection that I can see to this bill is in favor of the real estate speculator who thinks he can get somebody on the hook who knows nothing of values in the section where he desires to purchase. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Beyan].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. The whole tendency of the present day is to make conveyancing simple and to make the legal forms as simple as possible. The last form of a statutory deed in my State contains only four or five lines, a mere conveyance and warranty. It ought to be so that a man or a woman can go to a notary public and execute a deed, and that man or woman know when they look at the deed, with the assistance and suggestions of the notary making the acknowledgment that it is a good deed. It is wrong to pass a law requir-ing everyone who wants to sell a piece of land to go to some lawyer's office and say, "Mr. Lawyer, I want to transfer my grounds and buildings, and I want to be sure that the right kind of affidavits are drawn up, because I understand that a new law has just been passed by Congress that will not accept the ordinary notary deed, but an affidavit has got to be filed with it."

I say it is further wrong to pass a law requiring anybody receiving a deed of a piece of property to go to a lawyer's office and say to him, "Mr. Lawyer, I am going to buy a piece of property, and I don't know whether the deed is any good or not, because Congress has passed a law requiring affidavits to be filed, and I want you to pass on it."

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Why would you need the services of a lawyer any more to execute a deed under this bill than you do under the

Mr. BRYAN. Because I have heard four or five lawyers on the floor this afternoon discussing the features of this bill and whether certain features would be valid or not, and they all disagree. How could an ordinary person who knows nothing about the law know whether it was sufficient without getting the advice of a lawyer?

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the gentleman believe that the printer would put out blank forms, complete in every respect, as they now put out forms under the present law?

Mr. BRYAN. There are so many miscellaneous features in the ordinary transaction of conveying real estate or exchanging real estate that it is impossible for any form to be drawn that will fit the average occasion for transfer where all of these things are required. The Torrens land law is favored especially because a man can take his certificate to the auditor and have a transfer entered on it without going through a whole lot of formality. The purpose is to limit formalities and make conveyances simple and easy.

We all know how often a deed is executed in blank, sent to a friend and told to fill in the name of the party and make the transfer. Some one of our constituents owning land here sends a deed and tells us to fill it in. That is done all over the country to a more or less degree. There is no use in making a different law, with new restrictions, for the District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Tennessee stated conditions in his State that applied only to nonresidents of Tennessee. They are not applied to residents. There is no State in the Union that has this kind of provision to tangle up the title to real estate, promote lawsuits, make conveyances hard, and I do not think it ought to be introduced here. I think that the simple, plain deed tending to do away with lawyers and to make matters as easy and as simple as possible is desirable. Many times deeds are executed in foreign States and sometimes in foreign lands. A uniform system of conveying land all over the country should prevail, as near as possible.

One further suggestion: Certainly there is some board of commissioners or assessors that has the right to call before it the people of this city, the real estate men, and any others, and find out the value of property and ask any question they see fit. That is the best way to get at the average value of property, and not depend on deeds executed here, there, and anywhere. At present they assess the land on a certain percentage value. I am with the gentleman from New York [Mr. George], in favor of assessing land for the full value, but I do not believe we ought to tangle up the titles by making a requirenot believe we ought to tangle up the titles by making a requirement that runs with the land, making titles void unless onerous and unusual requirements are complied with.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "officer," insert the words "of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "loan," insert the words "for the purchase price or any part thereof."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the committee will accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the committee accepts that amendment.

Decker

accepts that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a fhird time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARDNER) there were 30 ayes and 19 noes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Greene] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Door-keeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 234, nays 62, answered "present" 1, not voting 136, as follows:

DISMISSAL OF CHARGES AGAINST HON. RICHARD S. WHALEY, FIRST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a privileged resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 356.

Resolved, That the charges filed by John P. Grace against Richard S. Whaley, Representative from the first congressional district of the State of South Carolina to the Sixty-third Congress, be dismissed.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, there is a majority and minority report upon this resolution. My colleague [Mr. Freak] has the minority resolution. I ask that three hours be allowed in the discussion of this resolution, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks that debate on this resolution be limited to three hours, one half of which time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. We had agreed, Mr. Speaker, upon three hours, thinking that three hours, if agreeable to the House, would be sufficient time to cover the record and the two reports that have been presented, but I learned this afternoon that a gentleman of the majority wished to take more time than previously considered, and he thought that we ought to have four hoursis, two hours apiece. I simply present this in justice to him, and will say this is a matter of very much importance, because it involves the corrupt-practices act, which we have to consider, and the whole matter must necessarily be presented in the proceedings which we have here. We have just spent about three hours in discussing elementary questions of law, and I would therefore suggest we might have four hours, simply for the purpose of permitting Mr. Borchers to have additional time, if that will be agreeable.

Mr. POST. I think discussion ought to be confined to three

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the reading of the reports and debate on this matter shall be limited to three hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we make it three and a half hours, for the benefit, really, of that side of the House.

Mr. POST. Well, I will modify the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request and makes it three hours and a half. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I understand that that means that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But I understand the minority has a substitute resolution. I take it that would be in order to be offered at the end of that time and the previous question be considered as

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio include these things in his requests?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And it is further requested that at the end of three and a half hours, or if it breaks down earlier, that the previous question shall be considered as ordered and that the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear] shall Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the fortifications bill follow this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will not follow it to-night. It will follow it to-morrow when we get through this.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. To-morrow being Calendar Wednes-

The SPEAKER. No; to-morrow is Tuesday. Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I beg pardon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution, and also the minority resolution and read both reports.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The reports are not read as a matter of right and can only be read in the time of gentlemen at the request of gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The Clerk will read both resolutions. 'The Clerk will report the minority resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Elections Committee No. 1, to which was referred charges filed by John P. Grace, an elector residing in the first congressional district of the State of South Carolina, against Richard S. Whaley, a Member of this House, representing that district, has held hearings at the city of Washington in order to determine the necessity for asking for authority whereby to conduct an investigation into the facts, and pursuant thereto has filed a record of its proceedings and its report thereon:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Post] is recognized for 1 hour and 45 minutes.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, John P. Grace, present mayor of the city of Charleston, S. C., on the 20th day of September, 1913, filed written charges, in the form of an affidavit, against the Hon. Richard S. Whaley, Congressman elect from the first congressional district of the State of South Carolina. These charges were addressed to the Speaker, and questioned the right of the sitting Member to a seat in the House. The Speaker of the sitting Member to a seat in the House. The Speaker referred the consideration of the charges to the Committee on Elections No. 1 for consideration.

On the 1st day of April, 1913, a primary election was held in the district for the purpose of nominating a Democratic candidate to succeed the late Hon. George S. Legare, who died on the 31st day of January, 1913.

At this election there were five candidates—E. W. Hughes, J. G. Padgett, John H. Peurifoy, George von Kolnitz, and R. S. Whaley. Mr. Hughes and Mr. Whaley in this contest received more votes than any of the other candidates, and under the laws of the State of South Carolina it is provided that the two receiving the highest number of votes shall submit to a second primary. The second primary was held on the 15th day of April, 1913. In this contest Mr. Whaley received the majority of the votes cast, and at the special election held on the 29th day of April, 1913, he was unanimously elected to fill out the unexpired term caused by the death of Mr. Legare. Mr. Whaley received a certificate of election, and on the 9th day of May, 1913, appeared at the bar of the House, took the oath of office, and has since been serving as a Member.

The first congressional district of South Carolina is composed of the five counties of Charleston, Clarendon, Colleton, Berkeley, and Dorchester. In the first primary Mr. Whaley received 3,156 votes, Mr. Padgett 1,698, Mr. von Kolnitz 1,451, Mr. Hughes 2,860, and Mr. Peurifoy 1,332. In the second primary the votes were distributed, by counties, as follows:

more distributed by something the sound in Charleston	6, 168
Clarendon	1,519
Colleton	1,807
Berkeley	953
Dorchester	1,603

Of which Mr. Whaley received 6,298 and Mr. Hughes 5,752 votes, giving Mr. Whaley a majority of 564 votes. The vote, distributed by counties, between the two candidates was as follows:

	E.W. Hughes,	R.S. Whaley.
Charleston. Clarendon Colleton Berkeley Dorchester.	3,105 776 752 522 597	3,063 743 1,059 431 1,006

I am giving these election statistics in detail because of their bearing on the question at issue, as will be hereinafter pointed out

Mr. Whaley, in compliance with the corrupt-practices act passed by Congress and approved on June 25, 1910, and amended by an act of Congress approved August 19, 1911, filed a statement with the Clerk of the House showing his campaign expenses in the two primaries, and exhibited that he had spent in both of the primaries $4,553.10. Mr. Grace in his affidavit charges that Mr. Whaley committed perjury in verifying the statement of his campaign expenses filed with the Clerk of the House. He alleged in his affidavit that the statement that Mr. Whaley made was false, in that the statement that he had expended only $4,553.10 was incorrect, and charged that he had spent in the two primaries a sum of money, distributed by various persons in the wholesale bribery of voters, that would aggregate at least $60,000. He also charged that the allegation in his statement of campaign expenses to the effect that Mr. Whaley had not received any contributions was false, and that he had made no promises was also false. The prayer of the petition was that the charges might be investigated and, if found true, that Mr. Whaley be expelled from his seat in the House. The petition also charged that Mr. Whaley at the very inception of his candidacy announced that whoever en-tered the race must be prepared to outspend him in money; that this intelligence speedily resolved the campaign into unprecedented vote buying and selling; that he deliberately placed in the hands of various persons in the several counties of the district for the purpose of corrupting and debauching the electors large sums of money, in some instances as much as $6,000 in a single county; that he placed in Colleton County the sum of $5,000, in the hands of Mitchell Whitsell, W. B. Ackerman, and James Peurifoy; in Dorchester County, $6,000, in the hands of Louis Simmons, O. B. Limehouse, and Walter Utsey; in Clarendon County, $6,000, in the hands of Dr. Dick, Walter B. Logan, Ben Harwin, and others; in Berkeley County, $2,900, distributed by Russell Williams and others; an aggregate of $19,900 to be used in the second primary alone. He alleged that in Charleston County, in the city of Charleston, Mr. Whaley distributed for the purpose of corrupting the voters the following Charleston, ward 3, $200, distributed by Max Goldman; Charleston, ward 3, $400, distributed by T. H. Young; Charleston, ward 5, $600, distributed by Joe La Torri; Charleston, ward 5, $1,500, distributed by W. J. Bennett; Charleston, ward 7, $2,200, distributed by H. O. Whittington and J. W. Dunn; Charleston, ward 9, $5,000, distributed by J. J. O'Shaughnessy; Charleston, ward 9, $2,000, distributed by B. P. Cary and Louis Morilla; Charleston, ward 9, $300, distributed by Harry Friend; Charleston, ward 9, $200, distributed by Robert Wicket; Charleston, ward 10, $1,300, distributed by Frank Simmons; Charleston, ward 12, $5,000, distributed by A. J. McInnes; Charleston, $5,000, distributed by M. P. Heely; McClellonville, $200, distributed by L. Howitz; making a total of $23,700. Of this amount $22,700 is alleged to have been spent in the city of Charleston alone. He made no allegations as to what he claimed had been spent in the remaining six wards of that city, there being 12 wards. According to the allegations contained in his memorial of the $22,700 alleged to have been spent in the six wards, $17,500 was spent in the second primary. I have been thus explicit in setting out the character and nature of the charges alleged that the House may understand their gravity.

When a question is raised as to the election of one of its Members the House should stand ready to make a thorough investigation and promptly expel the Member whose seat was obtained by fraudulent or dishonest methods. The issue presented to us was not whether Mr. Whaley was guilty as charged, but whether the charges, grave as they seem to be, should be investigated. As I have heretofore stated, the memorial was filed on September 20, 1913, and the time to institute a contest had long since expired. Notwithstanding this fact, we gave Mr. Grace ample opportunity to furnish some tangible evidence in proof of his allegations. In this connection it may not be amiss to say that the committee found that it was without the power of subpœna and could not compel the attendance of witnesses before it.

In the case of a contest the statutes make ample provision for the taking of testimony. The right of a Member to a seat in the House may be questioned in one of four different ways:

First. In the case of a contest between the contestee and the returned Member of the House instituted in accordance with the provisions of law.

Second. In the case of a protest or memorial filed by an elector of the district concerned.

Third. In the case of the protest or memorial filed by any other person.

Fourth. On motion of a Member of the House.

Mr. Grace failed to avail himself of the second method pointed He could have instituted a contest, being an elector of the district, by filing the proper memorial within the time prescribed by the statute. As I shall show, he was cognizant of the facts that he attempted to establish not only during the period of 30 days allowed to institute the proceedings of contest, but had full knowledge of the facts as he alleged them to be upon the very day of the primaries, the conduct of which he complains. None of the candidates in either of the primaries saw proper to enter a contest. Had Mr. Grace instituted a proceeding in contest, a majority of the House would have been sufficient to have determined the question. Notwithstanding this fact, he withheld his protest until the latter part of September, a period of about five months. By withholding his memorial the question presented resolved itself into one for the expulsion of a Member of the House. Under the Constitution each House may determine its rules of procedure, punish its Members for disloyalty, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member. The power of expulsion is a necessary and incidental power inherent in all legislative bodies. It is a power of protection. It necessarily abides in the House, in order that it may perform its highest functions, and is necessary to the safety of the State. A Member may be wholly unfit through some physical disorder or mental derangement to perform the duties of his office. His conduct may be so disorderly as to obstruct the ordinary business of the House. He may be guilty of a crime, or may be disloyal, or do many things which may render him ineligible as a Member. In cases like this the power to expel is invaluable. This power may be exercised for misconduct upon the part of a Member committed in any place, either before or after conviction in a court at law. From a careful survey of the precedents of the House and Senate, its extent seems to be unlimited. It appears to be a matter purely of discretion to be exercised by a two-thirds vote. However valuable this power may be, inherent as it is in every legislative body, yet in good conscience it must be fairly, intelligently, and conscientiously made, with due regard of the rights of the individual Member affected.

The rights of the accused Member should be carefully safe-guarded for the reason that from an abuse of this discretion vested in the House there is no appeal. Its judgment in the matter is final. Upon the one hand, then, we have the rights of the individual Member affected, and on the other the question of the honest election of such a Member, a matter of the highest importance both to the House and to the people at large. Keeping these facts constantly in mind, I assert that a majority of the committee, in numbers seven to two, gave Mr. Grace ample opportunity to present such facts or circumstances as would furnish the basis for an investigation of the serious charges contained in his memorial. He was permitted to furnish testimony by affidavit to support his charges; he was given from the 20th day of September to the 1st day of December in which to produce his evidence, and up to the latter date filed 35 affidavits.

I call attention to the fact that under the situation the committee was compelled to act in the nature of a grand juryof an inquisitorial body-to determine whether or not an investigation should be made into the charges submitted by Mr. Grace. His witnesses testified through the medium of affidavits and were not subjected to the ordeal of a cross-examination. was permitted to produce evidence, wholly ex parte, without requiring the witness to face the person accused. Such a power placed in the hands of Mr. Grace gave him much more latitude than would have been accorded him had he been required to produce witnesses who would be subject to the ordinary rules governing the production of testimony. Yet with this unlimited power a majority of your committee, after a painstaking and careful investigation of all the facts and circumstances produced by Mr. Grace, not only by way of affidavit but by oral testimony of his witnesses, experienced no difficulty whatever in determining that such evidence wholly failed to establish any of the facts alleged in his memorial by that degree of evidence required by the rules of law recognized in civilized countries.

The whole of the testimony adduced by Mr. Grace in support of his charges was mere hearsay and was of that character resembling the scintillations emitted by those usually disappointed in the result of a political campaign. No good lawyer would advocate the instigation of an investigation based solely upon mere rumor. No grand jury would be justified in returning an indictment charging a crime unless it was established to the grand jury's complete satisfaction that a crime had been committed. The basis of every criminal charge is the corpus delicti, and in every criminal jurisprudence no individual is every charged without it being first established beyond controversy.

The basis for a complaint being established beyond refutation, the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction may be looked to to determine who should be accused, and a jury may indict and convict from circumstances alone. It is so well settled that the ordinary rules of evidence apply as well to an election contest and expulsion cases as to other cases that it is unnecessary to cite precedents.

Mr. Grace presented the affidavits of 35 persons, the character and standing of each of whom are very questionable. He also produced before the committee four witnesses-H. F. Hogan, M. J. Barry, Stephen D. Sargent, and H. Leon Larisey. Hogan was a Hughes supporter. His testimony before the committee bordered upon sensational. At the very outset he gave us to understand that he was "an experienced politician" and that "people found me out to be honest and truthful and got me to handle their campaign." The evidence discloses that he was usually known as "Rumpty Rattles" Hogan; that his occupation was that of running a "blind tiger" in the city of Charleston and that he kept such a notorious dive that the governor of the State was compelled to eradicate his place of governor of the State was compelled to eradicate his place of business. He was completely under the domination of Mr. Grace, and after having been driven out of the blind-tiger business the mayor placed him upon the city pay roll. He boastingly admitted that E. W. Hughes in the first primary put $1,200 in his hands and in the second primary $1,600 for the purpose of debauching the electorate, and that he spent these sums "by giving it to the fellows to pay them off." To cap the climax of his testimony he made oath that "I am not out for money; I am out for principle." His appearance, his conduct upon the witness stand, and his testimony were such as to render him wholly unworthy of belief, and no credence whatever could be placed either in his affidavits or his oral testimony.

If his statement to the effect that Mr. Hughes placed in his hands in the two primaries the sum of $2,800 for the purpose of buying votes and corrupting the voters in the city of Charleston, I am thoroughly satisfied that very little of it ever percolated through his fingers to the individual voters, notwithstanding his assertion that he was out for principle only.

Mr. Grace presented before the committee another celebrated citizen of the city of Charleston in the person of one M. J. Barry, who was designated by some of the witnesses as "Peglegged" Barry. Mr. Barry was also formerly the keeper of a "blind tiger," and enjoyed this distinction until Mr. Grace was elected mayor of the city of Charleston, after which he was promoted to a position as foreman of the grass gang on the streets of that city. He was notorious in the police court, was frequently arrested, and, to use his own expression, "frequently got out and spread the joy." Barry implicated various persons through hearsay. Among others he testified that he saw Judge J. J. O'Shaughnessy the evening before the second primary with a large roll under his arm, wrapped up in a newspaper. He was quite positive that this roll contained money. Judge J. J. O'Shaughnessy, as shown by testimony, is one of the magistrates of the city of Charleston, and has been elected to his office several terms. He was an adherent of Mr. Hughes. The evidence clearly demonstrates that the roll which he carried under his arm was the club roll of one of the wards of the city. This roll is a list of the registered voters and is perfectly harmless. This witness did not in any manner what-ever implicate Mr. Whaley or any of his friends in the unlaw-ful use of money at either of the primaries.

Another witness produced by Mr. Grace was one Stephen D. Sargent, a boiler inspector upon the Atlantic Coast Line. According to his story he was a very ardent supporter of Mr. Hughes. He openly confessed before the committee he spent $1,000 in the second primary in the interest of Mr. Hughes in the ninth ward, and $800 in the first primary; that Mr. Hughes, through himself and others, spent more than $5,000 in the ninth ward in the city of Charleston alone, and estimated that all of the candidates brought the grand total up to $13,000 in that ward. He said that he spent as high as $60 in the purchase of a single vote. After viewing this witness and observing his conduct and appearance, and giving careful consideration to his testimony, I am thoroughly convinced that his statements were so preposterous as to be unworthy of belief. He asserted that he performed his services to Mr. Hughes in dispensing $1,800 in a single ward in the city of Charleston without any compensation to himself whatever. Since his appearance upon the witness stand it was shown to the committee that this witness has been discharged from the Atlantic Coast Line for the misuse of the property of that company.

The last, and in fact the star, witness was a Mr. Larisey. He was Mr. Grace's right-hand man, especially in the present investigation. His part in the program was that of private detective. He traveled over the district and gathered testimony for Mr. Grace in the prosecution of his claim. Mr. Grace acknowledge that he had paid him between $600 and $700 for his services in this connection. He accused more than 50 persons in the district of handling money for the purpose of bribery. Every affidavit in support of the accusations was mere rumor. This witness was thoroughly impeached by counter affidavits filed by Mr. Whaley disputing the accuracy of his statements, and in addition to this many witnesses testified that his character and reputation was such that they would not believe him under oath.

One witness stated that he "does not know H. Leon Larisey, except by reputation, but on account of nature of said reputation and assertions made in his sworn statement, he could not believe Larisey under any circumstances, on any subject, on any occasion, connected with life or death, the present, or the here Several witnesses with whom Larisey alleged that he had had conversations denied that they even knew him and branded his statements as absolutely false and untrue. A practicing physician and mayor of the town of Walterboro, in Colleton County, filed an affidavit to the effect that he had known Larisey for a long time, and he has always borne the reputation of a crook and a swindler and willing to do most anything for a dollar, and he would not believe him under oath. Six of the witnesses from whom Mr. Grace obtained affidavits filed counter affidavits repudiating the testimony that they had given in their first affidavits. As a sample of this class of testimony, Mr. Grace filed the affidavit of Frank Fosberry, who made some startling accusations against several of the citizens of the city of Charleston. Fosberry in his second affidavit claims that he did not sign his name to the first affidavit, but if he did sign it that he was in such an intoxicated condition that he did not understand the import of the paper that he signed, and charged that the notary public before whom he executed the affidavit found him at the corner of State and Market Streets, in the city of Charleston, in a drunken condition; that he took him to the Atlantic Café, gave him two drinks, and took him to the office of Mayor Grace, where he may have signed the affidavit. He further stated that the affidavit was not read over to him, and that the statements contained therein were not true. In this connection, it is fair to Mr. Grace to state that he produced before the committee the notary public in question, who admitted that he had given the witness one drink before taking him to Grace's office and where the affidavit was executed. In only one instance in all of the evidence, either by way of affidavit or by way of oral testimony, did Mr. Grace connect Mr. Whaley by any direct testimony with the use of money in either of the primaries.

The affidavits of two policemen of the city of Charleston, George E. Plough and J. W. Moore, were filed with the committee. Plough stated he was stationed as a policeman before the polls of ward 3, in the city of Charleston; that he saw Mr. Whaley drive up to the curb on Broad Street where the polls were located; that one Max Goldman and Mr. Whaley conversed together; that Mr. Whaley during the conversation gave Mr. Goldman a large roll of greenbacks. Moore testified to practically the same state of facts. Their testimony was refuted by that of Mr. Whaley and Goldman. Both of these witnesses were under the domination of John P. Grace. The transaction as related by these two gentlemen is hardly probable. Necessarily there were many persons about the polls, and if such a flagrant affair occurred between Whaley and Goldman there should have been plenty of witnesses to it. Besides this, it is hardly probable that even if Mr. Whaley was engaged in such nefarious conduct that it would have occurred in such an open-handed manner as testified to by these two policemen. It is reasonable to presume that these two policemen were stationed at the polls in ward 3 for the purpose of seeing that no infraction of the laws was committed. They also testified that they saw various persons spending money around the polls that day, buying drinks, and saw money pass from one person to another, and it is passing strange that these two vigilant policemen made no arrests. A vigilant committee searching for the truth could hardly base an investigation upon such an improbable transaction. It is to be presumed that Mr. Grace, in his ardor to establish the serious charges which he promulgated against Mr. Whaley, in producing his oral testimony before the committee, would have presented witnesses whose character was above repreach and whose integrity could whose character was above reproach and whose integrity could not be questioned. He brought these witnesses before the com-mittee to the city of Washington at his own expense, and the testimony when thoroughly scrutinized was absolutely nothing but hearsay.

In refutation of the affidavits and oral testimony produced by Mr. Grace, Mr. Whaley was permitted to file counter affidavitsin number 95. While the evidence introduced in behalf of Mr. Grace's contention was mere rumor and wholly unadmissible in any jurisprudence, Mr. Whaley by his counter affidavits has, I seriously contend, completely refuted such affidavits has, I Time will not permit me to digest either his testimony filed or the testimony filed by the memorialist. I wish to call attention to Mr. Grace himself in this controversy. He made a statement before the committee under oath, from which it appears that he is now and for more than two years has been mayor of the city of Charleston; that in both of the primaries he was the chief manager of the campaign of E. W. Hughes. According to his statement, Mr. Hughes expended in the two primaries the enormous sum of $44,500, a large part of which was used in the city of Charleston, and must have been, if true, within the direct knowledge of John P. Grace. He stated that the purchase of votes by managers of the different candidates, his own as well as others, was carried to such an extent as to be open and notorious, and to come within the observation of everybody; that he was so constructed that he instinctively knew when and where it was going on; that he could smell it. He made the statement that on the day of the second primary in one of the wards of the city of Charleston, he learned that one Simmons, an alderman of that city, was dispensing money for the purpose of debauching the electorate in a small room near one of the pools; that he went into this room unmolested and saw Simmons sitting at a table; that he had at least $2,000 in money spread before him on the table; that men were waiting upon the outside to be paid off for their voting. claims that Simmons was working in the interest of Whaley; that he reproached Simmons, not for the fact that he was unlawfully engaged in open bribery, but for the fact that he was working for Whaley and not for Hughes, the Grace candidate; that he made no effort to arrest Simmons for his unlawful conduct, notwithstanding the fact that he was the chief officer of the city.

In this connection I desire to state that his statement in reference to Simmons was absolutely refuted by Simmons and others who observed the conduct of Simmons at that election. Grace was the chief executive of the city of Charleston and had under his absolute control at both of the primaries not only the large police force of the city of Charleston but other officers of the city. He had the power to appoint and detail special policemen for duty during the day of the elections. It is significant that he failed to cause any arrests to be made of those who were bribing voters and violating the laws of the State of South Carolina. The only plausible reason why no arrests were made, or the only reason why the chief executive officer did not see to the enforcement of the laws, was on account of his own culpability, he being engaged in the bribing of voters of which he now accuses Mr. Whaley. It was on ac-count of his own culpability that no steps were taken to punish those engaged in the open and notorious bribery of which he now complains. What sort of character is such a man? He admitted that he expended in his election as mayor of the city of Charleston the sum of $15,000; that the salary of his office was $3,500 for the term of four years; that he had expended in procuring his election in advance of receiving any of the emoluments of the office $1,000 more than he would receive during the four years of his administration of that office. The attitude he assumed was that his most ardent desire was to purify the elections in his own city and congressional district, but claimed that he was powerless, first, on account of his own culpability and, second, because the local criminal courts were inadequate to furnish any relief, and that the only remedy available to him was the one he had adopted in this case.

I admit the force of his first reason, but seriously deny that there is any potency in his second contention.

Sections 359 to 362 of the Criminal Code of the State of South Carolina makes repeating, bribery, offer to procure votes by bribery, threats, and duress crimes alike applicable to primary and general elections.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. POST. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I read in the paper the other day that the governor of that State has pardoned nine hundred and eighty and odd convicts. Does the gentleman think there is much use of convicting people of any crime down there?

Mr. POST. Not with a governor who will perform that way. Mr. COOPER. That is what he has done.

Mr. POST. And I understar I the legislature of that State threatened to pass a bill depriving him of the pardoning power. Mr. COOPER. Does not that show that the freedom with which convicts are pardoned in that State—murderers and all other kinds of convicts, according to the uncontradicted statements in the newspapers-leads men criminally disposed to be very bold in perpetrating offenses?
Mr. POST. Yes; that is true.

Under the criminal code it is made a penal offense to give a bribe for influencing a voter but not to receive one, and onethird of the pecuniary penalty shall go to the informer and the remainder to the State.

I can not believe that the sense of the justice of the people of Charleston and of the counties of the first congressional district is so innocuous that the local criminal courts are helpless or inadequate to furnish relief, as contended by Mr. Grace. Section 10 of the Federal publicity act provides that any persons willfully violating any of its provisions shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year or both. I can not believe that the people of the State of South Carolina are so dead to their sense of duty that the Federal courts of that State are inadequate to furnish relief against the violations of this most wholesome law.

Section 343 of the Criminal Code of South Carolina defines crime of perjury and fixes the penalty. If Mr. Whaley willfully and knowingly made a false oath to the statements required to be filed with the Clerk of this House, then he should have been prosecuted under that section for the crime

Section 5393 of the Revised Statutes of the United States defines the crime of perjury and fixes its penalty by a fine of not more than $2,000 or by imprisonment at hard labor of not more than five years.

It is certainly begging the question to say that the sense of justice, the honor, and integrity of the people of South Carolina has descended to such a low scale that a conviction could not be had either in the State or Federal courts in that State. If Mr. Grace was actuated by an honest desire to purify the elections in his own city and congressional district and to purify the civic and political conditions of his own people, I submit that the statutes of his own State and the Federal courts of his own State furnish him with more adequate remedies than the mere expulsion of Mr. Whaley from a seat in this House. In this relation I seriously question the motives of Mr. Grace, not only from these facts but from his attitude before the committee. It was that of vindictiveness, not only to the committee itself but toward individual members of the committee. His admitted turpitude in the various campaigns in which he has been enaged, the campaign of his own election for the office of mayor of the city of Charleston, convinced me that he is possessed with an insane malice toward Mr. Whaley and that his only motive in filing and prosecuting the charges preferred against Mr. Whaley is to satisfy his own revenge and forward his own personal ambitions. His hatred of Mr. Whaley is most malicious and virulent and was thoroughly emphasized by his conduct before the committee. He said:

I hate Mr. Whaley like a snake; I hate him because he is like a snake, and who does not hate a snake?

That-

all of the literature of the campaign referred to him specifically as a wiggler and as a man who knew how to make black white; and this is the characteristic—the snake characteristic—that he is now exhibiting before your committee.

Could language more thoroughly depict the ill feeling and hatred and maliciousness of this man against Mr. Whaley? Mr. Grace appeared before the committee in another aspect, which we think throws some light upon his attitude. The city of Charleston has a population of about 60,000 inhabitants. Under the laws of the State the only place where liquor is allowed to be sold is the county dispensary, from which liquor may be sold in quantities of one-half pint and upward. These dispensaries are State institutions and are conducted by county officials. withstanding this fact, Mr. Grace admitted to the committee that there was in existence in the city of Charleston at least 250 liquor establishments, the so-called blind tigers; that in most instances, he, as chief executive officer of the city, fined the keepers of these blind tigers every three months the sum of $50; that he covered these fines into the city treasury. The evidence disclosed that there is 500 places in the city that have taken out the Government license for the selling of intoxicating liquors. He filed with the committee a statement of fines collected from liquor cases, covering a period of his incumbency in office, showing that the illegal collection of money from those unlawfully engaged in bootlegging increased from $26,400 in 1911 to $32.700 in 1913. In this connection he not only admitted his own culpability in open and notorious bribery at elections, but stulified himself with the admission that he had violated the liquor laws of the State of his nativity.

In the course of his statements he deliberately maligned and denounced as wholesale corruptionists the people of the city over which he presides and the people of the first congressional district, and pictured the civil and political conditions to be in such a deplorable state that, in his opinion, you could not corrupt the negroes of the district any worse than the white people were corrupted in the last election.

To permit an investigation to be instituted upon the pretended claims of such an individual as this, actuated solely by a malicious motive and bent upon destroying the character and politi-cal life of an adversary without first requiring some evidence of culpability, would be to adopt a most dangerous precedent and for this House to stultify itself. From a careful survey of all the testimony, I am thoroughly satisfied that wholesale bribery, intimidation, corruption, and other forms of demoralization were resorted to in the two primaries in which Mr. Whaley was a candidate by Mr. Grace and others in order to encompass his

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Post] yield to his colleague?

Mr. POST. Yes. Mr. WILLIS. I understood from the gentleman's remarks a little while ago, and also from what appears in the report of the committee, on page 16, that Mr. Grace states that in the primary campaign Mr. Hughes expended $44,000. Did I correctly understand the gentleman?

Mr. POST. He stated he spent $44,500.

Mr. WILLIS. What I am trying to get at is this: Was any statement made before the gentleman's committee which shows the amount claimed to have been spent by Mr. Whaley? If so, what was the sum total of that? Perhaps the gentleman stated, but I did not get it.

Mr. POST. You want what Mr. Grace claimed?

Mr. WILLIS. That is what I want.

Mr. POST. That he could show he spent $60,000 and up-

Mr. WILLIS. Now, does Mr. Whaley make any admission of any amount whatever over that which was filed?

He made a statement before the committee. Mr. WILLIS. What I am trying to arrive at is the probable amount expended in this primary campaign.

Mr. POST. He filed a statement with the Clerk of the House that the amount was $4,553.10. The allegation of Mr. Grace is that Mr. Mr. WILLIS.

Whaley spent $60,000? Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. And Mr. Hughes spent $44,000?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.
Mr. WILLIS. Then, according to this allegation of Grace, something like $100,000 must have been spent in this primary?

Mr. POST. That is the way he placed it.
Mr. WILLIS. Your committee did not go into the matter to determine how much Mr. Whaley actually spent?
Mr. POST. We gave Mr. Grace every opportunity to present any evidence that would be admissible in any court—

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir.

Mr. FREAR. There was no power of subpœna with this committee, and Mr. Grace was compelled to produce his witnesses, and he brought seven witnesses from South Carolina at his own expense, and 64 affidavits were filed by him in support of the charges.

The committee does not make any finding as Mr. WILLIS.

to the amount of money that was expended?

Mr. FREAR. No, sir. Mr. WILLIS. For the very reason that there was no evidence that would be admissible in any prosecution?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit? He did bring four witnesses who testified before the committee?

Mr. POST. Yes, sir. Mr. GARNER. There was no statement of fact that connected Mr. Whaley with any expenditure other than that before the committee?

Mr. POST. None at all.

Mr. GARNER. So he evidently got his best witnesses if he paid their fares up to Washington?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I do not want to take up the chairman's time, but I will say that he wanted us to subpœna 150 witnesses whose names he gave us in detail, and we were unable to do a thing. We stood there with our hands tied.

Mr. GARNER. But it does seem reasonable that Mr. Grace should bring his best witnesses out of the 150. He did bring them here, and they testified before the committee, and there is not a word in their testimony connecting Mr. Whaley with this transaction as he alleges.

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not want to take up the gentleman's time. I will answer that in my own time.

Mr. POST. I will say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that the power to produce evidence where the witness is not re-quired to face cross-examination and does not have to face the accused was a more powerful instrument in the hands of Mr. Grace than if he had produced witnesses. They could make any statement they wanted to in the affidavits, and out of all that, the whole case of the gentleman made by all the affidavits, with the one exception that I pointed out to the House, were mere hearsay and rumor.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Did the committee come before the House asking that the House subpœna those witnesses?

Mr. POST. No, sir; we did not. Mr. GARDNER. Why not?

Mr. POST. The reason why we did not do so was because it was an unprecedented performance on the part of Mr. Gracesimply filing an affidavit accusing a Member of this Houseand we told him if he could produce any tangible evidence against Mr. Whaley we would bring a resolution on the floor of the House and ask for power to subpœna witnesses and incur the expense of conducting an investigation.

Mr. GARDNER. He could not bring his witnesses?

He had complete opportunity to file affidavits. Mr. GARDNER. Was there not a lot of witnesses? It seems to me I read so.

Mr. POST. No, sir. Every person that he accused of using money for the benefit of Mr. Whaley—every person, without a single exception, filed a counter affidavit denying it.

Mr. GARDNER. Did he not propose to bring up some of Mr. Whaley's political friends?

Mr. POST. He named those friends to the committee, and Mr. Whaley procured affidavits from those persons.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman has overlooked some of the facts, Mr. POST. I will say to the gentleman that I am perfectly familiar with this case. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if he had any dealings with this man Grace, as the committee did, he would have come to the same conclusion with respect to him as the committee did.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POST. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course the committee arrived at the same conclusion as everybody else has arrived at who knows Grace and his trade. But the affidavits, as I understand, that were filed by Grace were general affidavits, not specifying that John Jones received a certain sum of money from Whaley or his manger. Did any of the affidavits contain those statements?
Mr. POST. Only one of them did.
Mr. HOWARD. Only one of them did?

Mr. POST. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. And Mr. Whaley procured a counter affidavit from that man, stating that that was false?

Yes. He filed his own affidavit in addition. Mr. POST.

Mr. HOWARD. And there was no testimony or affidavits to show a further expenditure on the part of Mr. Whaley other than the amounts he swore to and filed with the Clerk?

Mr. POST. No.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I think I am prepared to show that both gentlemen are wrong in their statements, but I do not want to take their time. I will speak in my own time.

Mr. POST. The gentleman can do that if he desires.

Mr. FREAR. I do not care to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Post] will

Mr. POST. On the other hand, I am of the firm conviction that Mr. Whaley's election was consummated by those of the very best element in his district; that his election was effected by that class of people usually free from the corrupting in-fluences alleged to exist in the city of Charleston and other points throughout the district.

Mr. Frear, in his minority report, calls attention to the assertion that $13,000 was corruptly spent by rival factions in ward 9, in the city of Charleston. I want to analyze the situation as it was admitted to exist in this ward.

The witness Hogan testified that he had 100 workers on his rallying committee; that Mr. Whaley had about an equal number; that the duties of the members of these so-called rallying committees were to go over the registered list of the club and purge it of unlawful registration, and on election day to see that the friends of the respective candidates were gotten to the polls and voted. He also testified that there were a great number of respectable voters in that ward who were not purchasable. In the second primary there were cast, in ward 9, a total of 550 votes. If we take the second primary as a basis and deduct the rallying committee from the total vote of the ward there would remain 350 voters. The members of the rallying committee were paid, according to the testimony of this witness, for the work they performed before and on the day of election from $10 to $25 apiece. Allowing that each member of the rallying committee was paid the maximum price, or $25 apiece, then there would be distributed to these committees the sum of $5,000. According to the testimony of this witness at least one-half of the voters of the ward was nonpurchasable; this would make the number of nonpurchasable voters 225, which, deducted from 350, would leave 125 purchasable voters. Deducting $5,000 paid the rallying committee from the $13,000 expended, it would leave $8,000 expended in the purchase of 125 voters, or about $65 per vote. Such a proposition is unbelievable, but in line with the kind of testimony adduced to bolster up the claims of Mr. Grace.

Mr. Frear makes complaint of the fact that Mr. Whaley was permitted to appear before the committee on December 3, and of the fact that Mr. Whaley made a statement as to his rela-tions with Mr. Grace. Mr. Whaley did not appear before the committee at any time Mr. Grace was present. However, he informed the chairman his reason for not so doing was that Mr. Grace was so bitter and hostile toward him and was so obsessed and insane by reason of his personal hostility toward him that it would be most disagreeable for him to endure the vituperation that Grace would endeavor to cast upon him.

After listening to this witness and observing his conduct and demeanor before the committee and his exhibition of malice and hatred toward Mr. Whaley, I am satisfied that Mr. Whaley was thoroughly justified in the conclusion he had arrived at and that his failure to appear before the committee in the presence of Mr. Grace was perfectly justifiable.

Mr. Grace frequently admonished the committee to the effect that the charges came from the mayor of the city of Charleston, and insisted for that reason alone an investigation should be instituted. It does not appear from the testimony that Mr. Grace was ever before elected to any office. On the contrary, Mr. Whaley served 11 years as a representative in the State legislature in South Carolina; he was chairman of many of the most important committees of his State legislature and was chairman of the judiciary committee of that body for 4 years; he served 1 year as speaker pro tempore, and was elected and served 4 years as speaker of that body; he was unanimously elected as president of the State Democratic convention in South Carolina in 1910; in 1912 was elected in his district as a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Baltimore; and in 1913 was elected as a Representative in Congress from the first congressional district of his State. These many official positions held by him and his long tenure of public service are some evidence of the esteem, respect, and confidence in which he is held by the people of his district and State.

He is by no means a wealthy man and is not surrounded by rich relatives or friends. His fortune is so small as to render the charges ridiculous. I am not unmindful of the seriousness of the charges made. I believe in the publicity act and that its provisions should not be treated lightly. It is a most wholesome law and its provisions should never be compromised. Any Member of this body who has violated that act should be promptly expelled. It should not be treated as a farce and if a Member has procured his seat by corrupting and debauching the electorate of his district, the House should not hesitate to expel him. However, when the electors of a district return a Member to this body their judgment and decision should be given proper weight. The Member should not be deprived of his rights by a single individual when it is shown beyond controversy that such individual is imbued with the single idea of revenge, bent solely upon destroying the character and political life of an adversary. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POST. Yes.

TOWNSEND. Not being a lawyer, I need to have a candle held for me sometimes in these matters. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if I correctly understood two things that were in discussion in the colloquy. The affidavits that Mr. Grace presented to your committee were very general in their character, and did not mention specific acts which would convict Mr. Whaley of the general charge. Am I right in that respect?

Mr. POST. The gentleman is right in that. They did not connect him, and they were mere hearsay.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Grace did mention the names of people, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gaedner] says, who were friends of Mr. Whaley, whom he would like to have subpænaed.

Mr. POST. Yes

Mr. TOWNSEND. The affidavits procured by Mr. Whaley from those gentlemen were very specific in favor of Mr. Whaley?

Mr. POST. Yes; they deried the rumors.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Thank you. I want to get that clear in my mind.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I do not think he has it at all clear in his mind. I think the gentleman from New Jersey has it now confused in his mind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; it is quite clear. Mr. GARDNER. What I said was this: That Mr. Grace wished to get unwilling witnesses who were friends of Mr. Whaley and could not get them except by subpænaing them. I was asking why the committee refused to come to the House to get authority to subpœna them. But those were not the men from whom affidavits were procured. Those people from whom affidavits were procured were the friends of Mr. Hughes, and not of Mr. Whaley.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts still has it wrong in his mind. Those affidavits which

Mr. Whaley procured— Mr. GARDNER. Which Mr. Grace procured-

Mr. GARDNER. Which Mr. Grace procured—
Mr. TOWNSEND. No; which Mr. Whaley procured, were affidavits of men mentioned by Mr. Grace as those whom he would like to have subpensed here.
Mr. GARDNER. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.
Mr. TOWNSEND. Whereupon Mr. Whaley procured the testimony for the committee in the absence of the power of the committee to subpœna them.

Mr. FREAR. That is not strictly the case.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted-To Mr. Neeley of Kansas, for seven days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. BRUCKNER, for four days, on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

An act to enjoin and abate houses of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution; to declare the same to be nuisances; to enjoin the person or persons who conduct or maintain the same and the owner or agent of any building used for such purpose, and to assess a tax against the person maintaining said nuisance and against the building and owner thereof.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. POST. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, January 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

Tuesday, January 27, 1914.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYL-VANIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina if this is the bill he had in charge?

Mr. OVERMAN. My attention was diverted for a moment. do not understand what bill it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the bill the Senator from North Carolina had in charge, providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern district of Penn-

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to make a motion that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. The motion I wanted to make I think would come before that motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. All right.
Mr. NORRIS. I wish to move to instruct the conferees, and I offer the following.

Mr. OVERMAN. The conferees have not yet been appointed. Mr. OVERMAN. The conferees have not yet been appointed. Mr. NORRIS. I think the time to instruct the conferees is before they have been appointed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rise to a question of order. A motion to instruct the conferees is not in order until after the conferees have been appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be the ruling of the Chair that the conferees must first be appointed, if there is to be a motion made to instruct the conferees.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I have no objection to that course, if that is to be the order, although it has always seemed to me as a parliamentary proposition that the conferees ought to be instructed before they are appointed. Otherwise it might show a lack of confidence in the conferees.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no one to instruct until they have been appointed.

Mr. NORRIS. There would have to be conferees appointed before it went any further. The resolution I propose agrees to a conference. I think that is sufficient to meet that proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. My motion is that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the request of the House that there be a conference appointed. After that is acted on, then the Senator can present his motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It may be considered as an amendment to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska will

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 32, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be instructed in lieu of Senate amendment No. 1 to said bill to agree to an amendment to said bill, as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter in making an appointment to fill a vacarey in a judicial office the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of any person for such office, filed either with him or in the Department of Justice, and he shall likewise make public the names of all persons making oral indorsements in behalf of any person for such office."

Mr. OVERMAN. Before that question is considered, we ought to have a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst Bankhead Hollis Stephenson Sterling Sutherland Swanson Jones Poindexter Bristow Kenyon Kern Pomerene Reed Robinson Bryan Chamberlain Chilton Clark, Wyo. Lane Lane

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. In order that the Senate may understand what the proposition is I will state that this is a bill for the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. The House put on it the following provision:

Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge.

The bill came from the House to the Senate. The Senate took action on this proviso and struck it out. The bill went to the House of Representatives from the Senate and the House refused to agree to the Senate amendment. Now, the question at issue between the House and the Senate is this proviso:

Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge.

That indicates the action of the Senate. The Senate has already acted upon that question and has stricken out those words. The House has refused to agree to it. So the question at issue between the House and the Senate is whether those words shall remain in the bill.

Now, here comes another proposition, which has already been passed upon by the Senate. The Senate has defeated the very thing the Senator from Nebraska is now asking to have inserted. Therefore I think his proposition is not in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to be heard just a oment. The bill, as the Senator from North Carolina has cormoment. rectly stated, passed the House providing for an additional judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. The bill as it passed the House and as it came to the Senate contained this language:

Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge.

When the bill came to the Senate an amendment in the Senate struck out that proviso, and it went back to the House. The House disagreed to the amendment and appointed conferees, and the bill is back here in the Senate now in order to get the action of the Senate to send the bill to conference. Thus far the Senator from North Carolina has stated the parliamentary situation correctly. If my resolution, which seeks to instruct the conferees, proposed to put back the same proviso that the Senate struck out, then I admit it would be subject to a point of order; but let us see what the resolution proposes to do. The resolution which I have offered reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 32, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be instructed in lieu of Senate amendment No. 1 to said bill to agree to an amendment to said bill as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter, in making an appointment to fill a vacancy in a judicial office, the President shall make public all Indorsements made in behalf of any person for such office, filed either with him or in the Department of Justice, and he shall likewise make public the names of all persons making oral indorsements in behalf of any person for such office."

The provision in the bill as it came from the House applied to one particular office, to one district judge and to none other. The amenament, by the instruction I am seeking to give, makes it a general law and applies to the appointment of all judicial appointments which may be made. Consequently, Mr. President, it is a vastly different proposition. It is a good deal broader than the language of the House bill; and if it becomes a law, it will apply to the appointment of every judicial position that it may be necessary to fill in the future.

I should like to ask the Senator if this is not Mr. REED. merely an attempt to amend the bill in the Senate after it has gone to conference-to add a new amendment and take the matter up all over again? If that can be done, why might we not continue it indefinitely?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I think not. It would be perfectly proper when the conferees meet, if no instructions were issued to them, to report back to the Houses a provision in lieu of the amendment made by the Senate striking out the proviso that the conferees agree to an amendment incorporating the very language I have included in my resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that is not the question in disagreement. The question in disagreement is the action of the Senate as to one proposition. Now, the Senator asks us to instruct the conferees to do an entirely different thing from the action of the Senate and to put into the bill a new propo-

Mr. NORRIS. It goes further, and it is perfectly proper to go further.

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to interrupt me?

Mr. BACON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly, but I wish to direct his attention to what is the well-established rule as to the power of a conference committee; that is, that the conferees are limited to the questions which are in difference between the two Houses. They can neither enlarge it nor can they diminish it.

Mr. NORRIS. As a general proposition, that is perfectly

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, the question between the two Houses is whether or not in the appointment of this particular judge, if the law shall authorize it, the President shall make public the indorsements which shall be offered in support of any candidate that is presented to him or the candidate that he shall nominate. The House voted that it should be so in this particular case; the Senate voted that it should not be so in this particular case; and the question in difference between the two Houses is necessarily limited to those narrow limitations.

The very statement of the Senator that it is proposed to engraft a general law as the report of the conference committee is the best answer to his suggestion. If the conference committee were to do it without any instructions, it would be illegal and would be so recognized by the Senate and by the House, and, of course, if it would be illegal for the conference committee to do it on their own motion, it is equally incompetent for the Senate to give an instruction which would be illegal.

We can not now amend the bill in the Senate. It has passed from us; it has received our action; and the only question between the two Houses is as to those matters in reference to which they have differed, and the scope of power of the conference committee does not extend to that which, as the Senator from Missouri properly said, would, in practical effect, be an amendment now made by the Senate after it has lost jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded, I wish to say that in the main I think he stated the parliamentary proposition correctly when he said that, in the other House, the House said that the President in making the ap-pointment provided for in the bill should give publicity to recommendations. The Senate struck that out by its amendment. It does not follow because the Senate struck that out that the Senate would not be in favor of making public recommendations for all judicial offices. In fact, this very bill, in another amendment of the Senate, which is section 3, provides for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit who shall receive the same salary, and so forth, and yet, if the House bill were passed without amendment, publicity of recommendations would apply to one of those judges and not to the other provided for in the same bill. It is perfectly proper for the Senate to say, "We want the publicity to apply to both judges"—that is one step—and then to go a step further and say, "We want publicity to apply to recommendations for all judicial officers," and that would include both of those provided for in this bill.

Mr. President, this happened once before in a preceding Congress when the other House put such a provision providing for publicity of recommendation into a bill for the appointment of a judge. I happened to be a Member of the House at that time and supported that proposition. I believe that publicity, as a rule, is the best cure for the evils of government and that there is no reason why the President should not give publicity to the recommendations of all judicial officers. I believe it would come as a great relief to the President if he had a spe-I believe it cific statute giving him this direction. The last Democratic national convention, speaking of the action of the House of Representatives in putting this kind of a provision in a bill as to one particular judge, approved of that action and used this language:

We commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made.

I am not reading this in any sense as a criticism; I believe in it. I was in the other House when it was done. Neither was it a partisan matter; but I heard during that campaign, Mr. President, several speeches, and I read several editorials in newspapers commending the Democratic House for putting this kind of a provision into a bill and condemning the Republican Senate for taking it out. It is not true that it was a partisan measure in the other House, for some Democrats there voted against it and some voted for it, and some Republicans voted for it and some voted against it. I presume the same division took place in the Senate, but, as a matter of fact, the House was Democratic and the Senate was Republican when that thing

I want to read a little further from a lecture delivered by Mr. Bryan, entitled "Signs of the times," in which he goes on to show the improvement that is being made in legislation, and he cites this very act of the House of Representatives as one improvement. This was not a partisan political speech, and he referred to the matter in very nice language, without making reference to any political party. I shall read this also, indorsing every word of what he says. He is speaking of several things. In order that we may get the connection I shall have to read his comments on several other subjects. Mr. Bryan

The purification of politics has kept pace with the reforms already mentioned. A few years ago a great Senator declared that purity in politics was an iridescent dream. That was back in the days when Wall Street nominated both candidates, financed both campaigns, took a mortgage on both administrations, and then said, "They are both good men; no matter which wins the people lose." But when the voters learned where the money came from and why it was given they demanded a remedy, and a law was passed making it a criminal offense for any corporation to contribute to a national campaign fund. This was a great step in advance, but it was not enough. Then came the demand for publicity as to individual contributions, and we secured, first, a law requiring publicity after the election and, later, a law requiring publicity before the election. But even this was not all that was needed, and the House of Representatives has gone three steps further in the matter of publicity. The first asked the President to make public the recommendations, written and verbal, upon which he appoints United States judges.

Then he proceeds to give the others-

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Nebraska is quoting from Mr. Bryan. I would ask the Senator if Mr. Bryan correctly states what the action of the House of Representatives

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I think probably he states it a little broader, if we are going to be technical about it, than as it actually occurred, because, as I understand the action of the House of Representatives and as I remember it, it applied only to the one particular judge provided for in the bill, the same as this does.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly so.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes: but what I want to do—
Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, when the Senator from Nebraska is quoting Mr. Bryan, he is quoting a statement of Mr.
Bryan which does not accurately set forth the situation either in this bill or the situation as it then was in the House of Representatives

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I presume, if the Senator from Wyoming wanted to be technical, that that would be true. Mr. Bryan is making a general statement; he speaks of it as though it were general, when, as a matter of fact, it was only specific.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I supposed the Senator from Nebraska was speaking of Mr. Bryan's statement with reference to the particular matter that is before the Senate at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. The particular matter that I have introduced in the shaping of this resolution would exactly carry out the statement of Mr. Bryan. It proposes to make general the law of publicity, instead of having it apply to a specific case.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It would undoubtedly carry out Mr. Bryan's views, but would not fortify the accuracy of his statement at all.

Mr. NORRIS. While I think technically Mr. Bryan's statement is too broad, it probably comes as near stating the situation accurately as do similar statements frequently made in public addresses. At least, the House took that step. lieved then it was right. The only objection I had to it then was that it was not general. In the House of Representatives, where the parliamentary situation is different from what it is in the Senate, an amendment such as I have suggested would not have been in order on that bill, or otherwise it would probably have come over to the Senate in general terms. If it is properand it seems to me that, at least, the Democratic Members of the Senate can not consistently contend otherwise, because they have the provision in their platform which I have quoted and an indorsement of their great leader—if it is right that such recommendations should be made public in specific cases, then certainly it ought to apply to cases in general. Por I believe firmly in the doctrine; I believe it was right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield; yes. Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will permit me, without reference to the proposition as to whether or not this policy ought to be pursued, I apprehend, under the point of order raised by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Over-MAN], the question is whether it can be put into law at this time and in this manner. In connection with it and in regard to the parliamentary situation, I should like to ask the Sena-tor's views on such a case as this: Suppose an appropriation were made by the House of Representatives of $100 for a specific object; suppose that the Senate should strike out that appropriation of $100 when it came here and should insert "$50" in lieu thereof, and that a conference was held between the two Houses, would it be proper for the Senate to instruct its conferees to agree to an appropriation of $150?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think it would.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President—
Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer that more fully first. I will submit again to further interruption. Let me put to the Senator an illustration which I believe would be more appropriate. I do not believe that the one he has suggested applies. House bill provided for the payment of a hundred dollars to John Doe, that the Senate struck it out, and that the bill came back again, the House refusing to agree to the Senate amendment; it would be perfectly proper for the Senate to in-struct its conferees to agree that that hundred dollars should be paid to John Doe and Richard Roe. It is not a question of the amount of money, with the House on one side and the Senate on the other, of a maximum and a minimum amount.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; but it is a question, in my judgment, Mr. President, if the Senator will bear with me, as to the substance of the proposition. The House proposes to lay to the substance of the proposition. The House proposes to lay upon the President the duty and obligation of furnishing with the nomination of an applicant for a particular individual office certain papers. The Senate says he shall not be required to furnish those certain papers in that particular case, as stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] very clearly. In view of that disagreement, it is proposed that the Senate shall instruct the conference part only to have the President furnish the instruct its conferees not only to have the President furnish the papers in that particular case, but in ninety-odd other cases of like kind. It seems to me the Senator can not escape the fact that his resolution is out of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Just as soon as I have replied to the Senator from Wyoming I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina. I want to say, in reply to the last suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, that the Senate might reject the amendment providing for publicity in a specific case for the sole and only reason that it wanted publicity in all cases. That would be a good reason

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but then the time for the Senate to act upon that reason would be when the bill was before the Senate, and not after it had gone to conference.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be perfectly proper to act then—there is no doubt about that—but there is no reason why it should not act whenever it has the papers officially before it, as it now has

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to read to the Senator an extract from the "Manual of the law and practice in regard to conferences and conference reports," found on page 440 of the Senate Manual.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. OVERMAN. The extract is as follows:

It is not the practice to instruct conferees before they have met and

We have had no conference, and consequently the conferees have not disagreed.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me read to the Senator something.
Mr. OVERMAN. I will read again.
Mr. NORRIS. Very well.
Mr. OVERMAN. It is further stated:

It is not in order to give such instructions to conferees as would require changes in the text to which both Houses have agreed.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, let me read from the precedents of the Senate, and I may remark, as I had occasion to do several days ago, you can prove anything you want to prove by the precedents of the Senate.

Mr. REED. May I inquire of the Senator if that is why he is citing the precedents now as authority—because they can prove anything on any subject?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am citing the precedents now to show that there is a precedent contrary to the contrary to the contrary. that there is a precedent contrary to the one to which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman] has called attention. I read from Gilfry's Precedents, page 223:

The committee of conference on H. R. 207, "to provide for the exemption of cotton from internal tax," being unable to agree, Mr. Sherman submitted the following resolution for consideration.

In that case the conferees had been appointed; they were unable to agree; and they so reported. That meant, if there was any further conference, there must be a new set of conferees appointed. A further conference was asked by the House, when Mr. Sherman submitted this resolution:

"Resolved, That the Senate agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 207, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be instructed to recede from the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, except so much of said amendmens as relates to imported cotton."

An amendment to this resolution was proposed by Mr. Morton and rejected. The resolution was then agreed to—yeas 25, nays 18.

Showing not only that the conferees were instructed before they were appointed, but even that the motion to instruct the conferees before they were appointed could be amended.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But had there not been a disagreement of the conferees?

Mr. NORRIS. There had been; but those conferees were out of office. The Senator will not contend, when conferees are appointed and report a disagreement, and then the House asks for a further conference, that the same conferees by virtue of their first appointment are entitled to serve?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all; but— Mr. NORRIS. They may be the same men, but they will have to be reappointed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the same subject has been in conference and goes to conference again.

Mr. NORRIS. I say it is the same as if there had not been any conference. I want to say further, in answer to the Senator from North Carolina—and perhaps add to what I have already said, which has excited the interest of the Senator from Missouri—that in the tariff bill which was enacted during this Congress the conferees reported an amendment which had not been considered by either House, but it was held in order in the Senate when the point of order was made. Not only that, but where there was a conference report on several items fixing the tariff, clear out of the range of the disagreement between the House and the Senate, that was held in order here in the Senate when the point of order was made. So, as I said a while ago, it is perfectly easy to show by the precedents of the Senate that you can do almost anything. I am not trying here to do anything like that. I am not even going that far; I am only going, in my judgment, to that extent which is properly within the limit of the work of conferees and within the power of either body to give instructions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield. Mr. REED. The Senator from Nebraska is a great stickler for publicity, for doing everything in the open, where every-body can know what is being done. If there is anything that harrows up his soul, it is something in the nature of a star-chamber proceeding, of a conference or agreement behind closed doors. I make these observations because I want to direct the Senator's attention to something.

Here is a bill brought before the House of Representatives and discussed which relates to one subject matter, to one thing only. It comes to the Senate, and is in like manner publicly discussed. Now, the Senator wants to add to that proposition an entirely different one that has not been discussed and has not come before the two Houses of the Congress for deliberation; he wants five or six men to get together in a room behind locked doors, with the press excluded, and have them in that room do a lot of independent legislation, which nobody has had any chance to discuss, and for those men to bring it in here as a conference agreement and put it through Congress without any opportunity for that character of discussion which is essential to all legislation. Now, I ask the Senator how he can stand with one foot upon the proposition that everything is to be publicly discussed here in this body and that all caucuses are an abomination to the Lord and a menace to human liberty and with the other planted upon the proposition that a conference composed of five or six men can get together and enact entirely new legislation?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator has made the observation he has. I wish to say, in the first place, that to most of the charge he has made against me I wish to plead guilty. I do believe in publicity. If I did not, I should not be offering this resolution. I do not believe, however, that it is a proper objection to the proposition I have introduced here to say that the conferees, after they are appointed, will meet in secret. I should like to go with the Senator from Missouri and adopt, by resolution here, a rule that would make the meeting of the conferees public. As I understand, there is no rule now that requires it to be secret. The Senator has it more within his power than I have it within mine to make the meeting of the conferees on this very bill a public meeting, where the newspaper correspondents, as he says, can come in, and others can listen to the discussion and the debate.

That, however, does not meet the proposition. I say we ought to have publicity of recommendations when the President of the United States makes an appointment. To answer that, the Senator from Missouri says, "Why, we have secrecy in conferees' meetings." In other words, if his theory be true, we never would get publicity along the lines I suggested here unless we took with it at the same time publicity in conference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President— Mr. NORRIS. I am not quite through answering the Senator. I wish to say, further, that the particular proposition I now have before the Senate, which the Senator says is one that we will not have an opportunity to discuss, and so on, is one that had attracted sufficient attention in the country to draw the attention of the framers of the last Democratic national platform; and at Baltimore they promulgated to the country the provision I have already read, commending the House in taking the step which I now want to take and make general, so as to apply to all.

As I said before, I am not mentioning that by way of criticism, because I believed it was right then. In my weak way I helped to do what was done in the House of Representatives. It seems to me, however, that it comes with poor grace from a man who has campaigned on that platform, who has been all over the country and indorsed it, to say now that we shall not have publicity of recommendations for judicial offices because, for sooth, the rules and regulations of the Senate and the House in the past have permitted conferees to meet in secret and consider behind closed doors what has been submitted to them.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to make one observation, so that the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska may not go to the country without a proper correction? I have not said on the floor of the Senate that I am opposed to any degree of publicity, but I have expressed my astonishment that a champion of publicity should want to have legislation enacted for the first time by conferees behind closed doors instead of bringing his bill in here to Congress in the open and letting it be fought out in the open.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me a sufficient answer to that is that if this were a proposition that never had been heard of before, there would be something in the argument made by the Senator from Missouri. As I said before, however, it attracted the entire country sufficiently, so that one of the great parties of the country made this particular provision part of its platform and censured the other party on account of it, and commended the House of Representatives for taking this step.

It is not a new thing. I do not know whether or not other Senators have heard it to the same degree that I have; but, as I said a while ago, I presume a hundred times during the last campaign I heard it discussed by speakers and by editors. I wish to go further and to say that in one case I know of a Democrat running for the Senate who read, in a stump speech, the particular clause I have read, saying:

That is what the Democratic House of Representatives did. If you will give us a Democratic Senate, we will make it a law and put it through there as well as through the House.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

Mr. NORRIS. It does not come with very good grace, it seems to me, that even though Senators may be in favor of it, they should resort to parliamentary technicalities to prevent the carrying out of their very platform.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts, who first rose.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

will take the floor when he has concluded.

Mr. JONES. I wish to suggest, in connection with the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri, that as I understand the proposition of the Senstor from Nebraska, it is not to refer this matter where it can be considered in secret, but it is an instruction from the floor of the Senate to the conferees to adopt a certain proposition,

Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. JONES. So that it will not be considered secretly at all, but will be considered here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is correct. It is debatable now, as I understand, and subject to amendment. If I have brought anything in here that is too broad, or not broad enough, it can be amended now.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe the question before us is a point of order. As I understand-and the Chair will correct me if I am mistaken-a bill came over here establishing a new judicial district and providing that the President, in making an appointment to that district, should lay before the Senate, or before Congress, all the recommendations of candidates for the appointment. The Senate struck out that proviso in the bill which applied to a single judge. I understand it is now proposed to instruct the conferees to put into this bill a provision requiring the President to submit to Congress the recommendations in all judicial districts.

That question has not been passed upon by either House. Neither House has the power to give to a conference committee a power which it does not possess itself. We have no power to instruct a conference committee of the two Houses to take up a subject which, in connection with the bill in conference, has never been before either House.

It does not seem to me possible that any such instructions can be in order for a conference committee. As to the merits of the publicity of conferences, that is something that has nothing whatever to do with the question of the powers of the Houses in instructing a conference committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not any doubt but that the position taken by the senior Senator from Georgia is absolutely correct, and he stated the case as I understand the rules

I wish, however, to call attention to section 45 of Jefferson's Manual, touching this very question.

On page 137 of the manual we find this:

Either House may recede from its amendment and agree to the bill, or recede from its disagreement to the amendment and agree to the same absolutely or with an amendment, for here the disagreement and receding destroy one another, and the subject stands as before the disagreement.

But the House can not recede from or insist on its own amend-ment with an amendment, for the same reason that it can not send to the other House an ..mendment to its own act after it has passed the act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?
Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.
Mr. NORRIS. If that point were made in the House of Representatives where some many training in the House of Representatives where some many training in the House of Representatives where some many training in the House of Representatives where some many training in the House of Representatives where some many training in the House of Representatives where some many training in the House of Representatives where the House of Representative where the House of Represe resentatives where some man was trying to put in what the Senate had stricken out it would be good, but it does not apply here.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it applies here, for the reason that the Senate itself struck out the provision of the House bill. Therefore it can not now amend an amendment that it has already stricken out of the bill on a previous occasion.

Mr. NORRIS. But the point the Senator raises is that it could not amend that amendment. It does not try to do it. It puts something in the place of it—in lieu of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not a question as to what the Members of the Senate may or may not desire to do.

is a question as to the power of the Senate.

The House of Representatives originally passed an act providing for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and provided in said act that the President should make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge. The bill came to the Senate and was open to amendment. It might have been amended, under the rules of the Senate, by requiring the President of the United States to make public all indorsements for all judges. There is nothing in the rules of the Senate that would have prevented the very amendment which is proposed to-day by the Senator from Nebraska from having been introduced at that time and passed upon and adopted by the Senate if the Senate had so desired.

The Senate, however, struck out the proviso with reference to making public the indorsements of this particular judge. The House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate and requested a conference upon the subject. from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] now proposes to amend the bill further by instructing the conferees to insist upon his particular amendment.

The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman] is well taken; that the only way in which the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska could have become germane to the bill would have been at the time it was being considered by the Senate, or prior to the refusal of the House of Representatives to concur therein by a motion to ask the House to return the bill to the Senate for further amendment.

The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from North Carolina.

The question now is on agreeing to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. CHILTON, and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I present sundry petitions which have been sent to me by Margaret Dye Ellis, the superintendent of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of this city. The petitions are from citizens of the towns of Petersburg, Wrangell, Haines, Seward, Cordova, Douglas, and Treadwell, all in the Territory of Alaska. The petitions bear the signatures of 267 persons of that Territory asking for prohibition and for the regulation of the liquor traffic in that Territory.

I do not ask to have the names printed, but as the petitions are very brief, each containing less than a dozen and a half lines, I ask that one of them may be printed in the Record and that they be referred to the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Territories and the body of one of them ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States of America, greeting:

We, the undersigned, voting citizens of Alaska, petition your honorable body to prohibit the sale of intoxicants in Alaska, and the traffic in the same in Alaska, for these reasons:

1. It is against the policy of the United States Government to permit the sale of intoxicants to the native races. These Indian and Eskimo tribes form a large proportion of Alaska's population. Unscrupulous men are violating the law and selling intoxicating liquors to Indians and Eskimos. Moreover, there is a large number of mixed bloods. It is a matter of notoriety that liquors are dispensed to these mixed bloods, and that through them as intermediaries a traffic is kept up with the natives.

is a matter of notoriety that liquors are dispensed to these mixed bloods, and that through them as intermediaries a traffic is kept up with the natives.

2. Alaska has but four judicial divisions for her vast territory; she has only a handful of commissioners and peace officers. Liquor drinking causes crime and lawlessness. We are without adequate protection against such lawlessness. The cost of travel is great, and, with places of holding court remote from each other, violation of law caused by drink imposes a heavy burden of taxation upon the Government.

3. The proportion of white men and white women is approximately 4 to 1. The home is recognized as a check to the saloon. But if three out of every four men have no home ties, there is little to counteract the demoralizing inflaence of saloons. Drink is debauching our young men. Social vice goes hand in hand with drunkenness. These things are ruining our manhood. It is wrecking the homes of Alaska.

Therefore, we ask that your honorable body will prohibit the sale and the traffic in intoxicants in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. WORKS. I have received a telegram from the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, bearing upon legislation affecting the Territory of Alaska. I ask that the telegram may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., January 24, 1914.

Hon. John D. Works, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, representing every substantial business and commercial interest thereon, views with gratification the relief which Congress is about to give the Territory of Alaska in the shape of legislation permitting of the development of its resources, a development which is vital and of tremendous importance to the commercial welfare of the entire Pacific coast. This organization urges you to exert your utmost influence to unlock the vast wealth of that Territory by the support of a program which will insure transportation facilities, and without which no material development can take place. We believe that this is a moral obligation fairly resting upon the Government in view of its previous attitude to that Territory.

Mr. WODENS. I present resolutions adopted by the Pacard of

Mr. WORKS. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Pasadena, Cal., relating to trust legislation. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the Record and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDRESS BY JUDGE ROBERT W. WINSTON (S. DOC. NO. 377).

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an address on judicial reform by Judge Robert W. Winston, of Raleigh, N. C., before the South Carolina Bar Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDRESS BY HON. DANIEL C. ROPER.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to present and to ask if proper at this time to have printed in the RECORD an address by Hon. Daniel C. Roper delivered before the seventh annual convention of the New Jersey State Association of Presidential Postmasters, September 13, 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to ask that the paper be printed in the RECORD or as a public document?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I asked that the address be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. I do not like to do anything that the Senator from New Jersey would not wish, but-

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not want the Senator to feel that way at all.

Mr. BACON. I think we ought to have a uniform rule, and do not believe in printing matter in the RECORD that has not been uttered on the floor. If the Senator desires to have it printed as a document, all right.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am quite willing to acquiesce in the judgment of the Senator. I think it a very fit and proper rule, but, at the same time, we have transgressed it, I think, a thousand times.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, more than that, Mr. President. Mr. BACON. If the Senate has transgressed it, it is all the more important that it should now cease.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire to press the

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that he request that the address be referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will be perfectly satisfied with that course. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 9842. An act to require the recital of the real consideration in deeds of property in the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to withdraw the notice I gave that I would address the Senate to-day on the bill (S. 3922) relating to presidential primaries and to current politics involved in the subject matter of the bill.

DRY DOCKS AT HUNTERS POINT, SAN FRANCISCO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4007) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to enter into contracts for use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I gave notice—
Mr. GALLINGER. The motion is not debatable.
Mr. NEWLANDS. I gave notice that at the close of the morning business I should ask the Senate to take up Senate resolution 241 for the investigation of rebates received by the Steel Trust. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane] is very anxious to have that resolution disposed of.

Mr. BRYAN. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that this bill can take but very little time, probably not more than enough time to read it.

Mr. BACON. If the bill leads to any discussion, I shall have to object, because there are important matters which ought to be attended to in executive session. While I am perfectly willing to forego that motion, it has precedence, as we all know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4007.

Mr. BACON. I do not know, if it is put as a motion, whether

I can acquiesce.

Mr. BRYAN. If the bill elicits debate, I shall ask that it be laid aside.

Mr. BACON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4007) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to enter into contracts for use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal., and it was read, as follows

Francisco, Cal., and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal., one of which docks shall be capable of docking the largest vessel that can be passed through the locks of the Panama Canal, for a period not to exceed six years from completion of such dock, at a compensation of not less than $50,000 per annum during said period of six years, the right of the Government to the use of said docks in time of war to be prior and paramount: Provided, That the construction of the large dock shall be undertaken immediately upon entering into this contract and shall be completed within 24 months thereafter: And provided further, That said contract shall provide for docking rates not in excess of commercial rates and for such other conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy prior to entering into such contract.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls attention to the language in line 9.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the Secretary re-peat the first paragraph of the bill. I did not catch the reading of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal., one of which docks shall be capable of docking the largest vessel that can be passed through the locks of the Panama Canal Canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is sufficient.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In line 9 the bill says "at a compensation of not less than $50,000."

Mr. GALLINGER. It should read "not more than."

Mr. BRYAN. In line 9, I move to strike out "less" and in-ert "more."

Mr. LODGE. It must be a verbal error. It should read "not more," of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the clause to which the Chair desired to call attention. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out the word "less" and insert the word "more" in line 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the report of the committee be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The report submitted January 21, 1914, by Mr. Perkins, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 163, Sixty-third Congress, second session.] DRY DOCKS AT HUNTERS POINT, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Mr. Perkins, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany S. 4007:
Your committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 4007) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to enter into contract for use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal., report it back without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The committee herewith submits a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs urging this legislation:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 9, 1914.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 9, 1914.

Hon. B. R. Tillman, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

My Dear Senator: Permit me to invite your attention to the provision in the estimates submitted to Congress in regard to a dry dock on the Pacific coast, as follows:

Construction and Repair.—That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal., one of which docks shall be capable of docking the largest vessel that can be passed through the locks of the Panama Canal, for a period not to exceed six years from completion of such dock, at a compensation of not less than $50,000 per annum during said period of six years, the right of the Government to the use of said docks in time of war to be prior and paramount: Provided, That the construction of the large dock shall be undertaken immediately upon entering into this contract and shall be completed within 24 months thereafter: And provided further, That said contract shall provide for docking rates not in excess of commercial rates and for such other conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy prior to entering into such contract. (Act Mar. 4, 1913, vol. 37, p. 904, sec. 1.)

In view of the approaching completion of the Panama Canal and the ensuing arrival in the Pacific of our fleet, I consider the possession of a suitable dry dock on that coast a matter of such commanding importance that I must request your earnest consideration of the above provision.

You will note that the period of construction is to be two years tance that I must request your earnest consideration of the vision.

You will note that the period of construction is to be two years from the date of signing the contract. This period is already longer than the interests of the Navy can well afford, and an effort will be made to reduce it as much as possible.

I therefore have to request that the proviso above quoted be taken from the naval bill and incorporated in a separate bill by itself.

With your familiarity with conditions on the Pacific, I need not urge the necessity of early action.

A letter of the same purport as this has been sent to the chairman of the House Naval Committee,

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,

Secretary of the Navy,

Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Otto R. Meyer to be receiver of public moneys at Dickinson, N. Dak.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, January 27, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We wait upon Thee, our Father in heaven, with bowed heads and susceptible hearts, as we thus stand on the threshold of this another congressional day, that we may feel the touch of an invisible hand, hear the voice of an infinite spirit, and go forward, assured of Thy presence, to uphold, sustain, and guide us, that we may hallow Thy name in thought, word, and deed, and thus fulfill the law and the prophets. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. Conry, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of death in family.

CIVIL LAWS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS (H. DOC. NO. 656).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 86 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith a set of the laws enacted by the Third Philippine Legislature during its first session, from October 16, 1912, to February 3, 1913, inclusive, and its special session, from February 6, 1913, to February 11, 1913, inclusive, and also certain laws enacted. to February 11, 1913, inclusive, and also certain laws enacted by the Philippine Commission.

These laws are supplemental to those transmitted by message of October 7, 1913 (S. Doc. 205, 63d Cong., 1st sess.), and contain additional acts and resolutions. None of them has been printed, as explained in footnote to the congressional document above cited.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 26, 1914.

DISMISSAL OF CHARGES AGAINST HON. RICHARD S. WHALEY, FIRST DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA (H. RES. 356).

The SPEAKER. In the South Carolina case the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Post] has 45 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear] has 1 hour and 45 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Borchers], but before doing so I will say that at the conclusion of this discussion both sides agree that they want a roll call, and both ask that, as far as gentlemen can accommodate themselves, they be present and hear this discussion. You can not get the facts in any other way, and we are going to try and present the matter in as concise and direct a way as possible. The issue is, Will you have an investigation in this case? I now yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Borchers], a member of the minority of the committee.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, being a new Member of this House and not specially gifted with the flow of eloquence, as is being continually exemplified here, and being thoroughly convinced that much time is wasted here in the display of states-manship, for no special good, at the expense of the American people, I have not seen fit heretofore to consume any tme on this floor. I have been content to read and listen to the expressions of those who have given the matter under consideration their attention, and then to vote as my own conscience dictated.

But now, in this matter before the House, I happen to be one of the committee to which it was referred, and as a member of that committee I have tried to find out the facts and come to some conclusion, and I realize it now becomes my duty, especially since I can not agree with the majority of the commit-tee, to express myself for the consideration of those who may desire to hear from me, and especially for the benefit of those who have not had the opportunity or time, with your multitudinous duties, to consider the same. It is a painful duty to disagree with the majority of a committee, and especially so when you so much admire its personnel. But my slience would be the approval of the report of the majority, and the membership of this House would have the right to assume as much, and, notwithstanding it is a conscientious matter with me and I feel it my duty to object to the majority report, I yet enter into it with about the same degree of enthusiasm or anxiety as, I might say, Miss September Morn entered into the cool waters of the mountain lake. I was called to my home on account of sickness at the time the report was made, and on account of which did not have an opportunity to join with the minority report, and had no opportunity to do anything more than to express myself to the distinguished chairman of the committee that I would be against the dismissal of the charges

Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust you will be patient with me for a few minutes, while I try to express myself in reference to the matter before the House, and give you my ideas about this case.

In the first place, it is simply a petition to have charges made against a distinguished Member of this House investigated, and, if found true, that he be expelled from his seat. Now, it is not a petition to hang anyone or to punish anyone, more than to make the investigation, and then, if the charges are substantiated by evidence to justify it, that the Member be expelled.

I have carefully read the report of the majority, and I do not understand how such an intelligent committee can come to such conclusions and base it upon the matters submitted.

I desire to call your attention to the paragraphs on page 4 of the report, beginning with line 3, which reads as follows:

The prayer of the petitioner is that these charges may be investigated, and, if found true, that Mr. Whaley be expelled from his seat in the House.

The procedure is an anomalous one, and so far as we have been enabled to determine without precedent. The ultimate object sought to be obtained by the petitioner is to expel a Member of the House. Under the circumstances this can only be done upon two-thirds vote of its membership. The question readily occurs to the mind, How is such a case to originate? Can an elector of a congressional district, by simply filing an affidavit with the Speaker of the House, invoke the power of the House to expel one of its Members? Will the House upon the complaint of a single elector, ipso facto, take jurisdiction of the subject matter of such a complaint? We call attention to the fact that the charges of bribery and misconduct relate principally to the manner and methods employed in the nomination of the accused. That no charges are made in the complaint against the accused as to the manner and method of his election. The real gist of the petitioner's complaint is the charge of perjury committed before and after the election of the accused as he claims in violation of the Federal statutes.

Now, I desire to specially call your attention to the question in said paragraph, as follows: How is such a case to originate? Then, also the question, Can an elector of a congressional district by simply filing an affidavit with the Speaker of the House invoke the power of the House to expel one of its Members? Also the question, Will the House upon the complaint of a single elector, ipso facto, take jurisdiction of the subject matter of such complaint? Now, according to the report, you must come to one of two conclusions, the first, that the honorable Speaker had no right to refer the matter to a committee and thereby invoke the power of the House; or, can a Member be expelled by simply filing an affidavit with the Speaker? Now, is that a fair statement or fair question to ask and embody in this report? I consider it is not, and is not based upon the facts. The petition calls for an investigation; the Speaker recognized it as such, and it was referred to the committee for that purpose, and it is not fair to make the statement that the Member is to be expelled upon that affidavit. And as I proceed I am convinced that I will be able to convince you that this report is based upon the same kind of reasoning in many places and should not be adopted.

And further in the same paragraph:

That no charges are made in the complaint against the accused as to the manner and method of his election. The real gist of the petitioner's complaint is the charge of perjury committed before and after the election of the accused, as he claims, in violation of the Federal statutes.

Now, I trust you will bear with me for a moment while we consider the complaint, and we will see whether this report has been built on a foundation of fairness or not, and I will call your attention to charge No. 3 in the complaint.

Third. That thereafter, to wit, on the 4th day of February, 1913, Richard S. Whaley announced his candidacy to fill said vacancy and began a canvass for the Democratic nomination, simultaneously circulating throughout the district, as your petitioner is informed and believes, that whoever entered the race must be prepared to outspend him in money, intelligence of which speedily resolved the campaign into one of unprecedented vote selling.

I will also read the fifth and ninth charges:

Fifth. That the first congressional district of South Carolina is composed of five counties, inhabited preponderantly by negroes, for the exclusion of whose participation in politics it is the custom by common consent for white men to settle their differences in the Democratic primary, the nomination in which is equivalent to an election; that there were in round numbers but 12,000 votes cast in the Democratic primary in these counties in which Mr. Whaley was nominated, distributed in the five counties as follows:

	Votes.
In Charleston County	6, 168
In Colleton County	1, 519
In Berkeley County	953
In Dorchester County	1,603

of which, on the face of the returns, Mr. Whaley obtained 6.298 votes; that thereupon Mr. Whaley was declared the nominee of the Democratic Party, and in a special election which was held on April 29, 1913, Mr. Whaley was elected without opposition to fill the unexpired term. That in order to obtain these 6,298 votes, as your petitioner is informed and believes, Mr. Whaley spent in the first and second primaries, and the campaigns incident thereto, not less than $60,000, or an average of about $10 for each vote.

I will now take up No. 9:

Ninth. That Mr. Whaley now sits in Congress, therefore, because he openly bought his nomination and election by going out upon the highways and byways and debauching the electorate and by using over twelve times as much as the maximum of money allowed by law, in avoidance of the consequences of which he afterwards committed four felonious perjuries.

Now, the statements in the third and fifth charges of the complaint are upon information and belief and are principally in reference to the expenditure of money in the primaries, and then when we come to consider charge No. 9, in which the bold statement is made, and not from information and belief, that Mr. Whaley now sits in Congress, therefore, because he openly bought his nomination and election by going out upon the highways and byways and debauching the electorate and by using over twelve times as much as the maximum of money allowed by law, which refutes the statement that no charges are made as to the manner and method of election, and then he further adds that, in avoidance of the consequences of which, he afterwards committed four felonious perjuries.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to, because I have so little time myself, and I want to get through a certain amount of this report. If I have time after I conclude what I desire to say, I will be very glad to answer any questions that gentlemen may desire to ask me, but at the present time I must decline to yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course I do not want to bother the gentleman, but there are some things that I want to know about

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield at this time.

Mr. BORCHERS. I now desire to call your attention to that part of the report on page 11, beginning with line 5, as follows:

We have cited these statutes, both State and Federal, for the purpose of showing that the memorialist, if the voters at the two primary elections held in the first district of the State of South Carolina were by Mr. Whaley and his friends debauched, and the enormous sum of money alleged to have been spent had been spent for that purpose, could, and as the majority of the committee believe should, have resorted to the criminal courts, either of the State or Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, from the time when I was a little boy and first began to read, and then as I progressed and learned the story of my country's history, the settlement at Jamestown and other places, the struggle with the savages, the privations of pioneer life, the Revolutionary struggle, my blood always tingled with excitement. I looked upon the Government which cost so much with the highest admiration, and I am now proud of the fact that I am a Member of the greatest legislative body in the world, sent here by the voice of the people; that I came here imbued with the highest admiration for this legislative body, but must confess that distance lends enchantment, and that my expectations have not been realized to the fullest; but, O God, grant that I shall not be a witness to this House adopting a report which provides that it shall take no action in reference to the election of its membership until the merits of the case have been passed upon by a police magistrate or some other officer of a criminal court.

The committee further reports that in a proceeding of this nature it is without authority to subpæna witnesses or to compel the production of papers or records, and it was therefore obliged to require the petitioner to present his case by affidavits and such witnesses as he might produce before the committee, and this is one of the very things I complain of, and urge that the substitute resolution be adopted and that provisions be made to give the matter a thorough investigation, and that the statement of the committee is an admission that the matter has not been thoroughly investigated.

But since the matter has been submitted by affidavits I desire at this time to refer to a few of them briefly. The first I desire to consider is the one of Samuel D. Barshay, then Frank Fosberry, which I desire to read in full, and which is as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, Charleston County:

Personally appeared Samuel D. Barshay, who, being duly sworn, made oath that he is engaged in business at No. 431 King Street, in the city of Charleston; that some time before the first primary one E. G. Heape came to him and, explaining that he was related to Mr. Whaley, said that he (Heape) would pay him $300 for the use of his upstairs until after the election. Mr. Heape said that if he had any doubt about his authority to make the deal he would bring Dr. Whaley, who was the candidate's brother, to see him to back it up.

Mr. Heape had money which I saw, which he said was to be used for Mr. Whaley. The day before the second primary Mr. Heape came into my place and set up the crowd and spent $16 in the interest of Mr. Whaley and gave me a check for it. I put the check through the bank, but after the election was over it was returned unpaid. I have the returned check, signed "E. G. Heape" (R. S. W.). Mr. Heape gave his check. I was so satisfied from the way that he had spent his money for Whaley and from the interest which he took in Mr. Whaley's campaign that there was no doubt that this check would be honored.

(Signed) Samuel D. Barshay.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 29th day of September, 1913.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 29th day of September, 1913.

(Signed) HARRY L. WILENSKY,
Notary Public, South Carolina.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. BORCHERS. I have refused to yield to others. Mr. DONOVAN. I only want to ask one question, and that is whether the gentleman who made that affidavit is a keeper of a blind tiger?

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I will read a counter affidavit, on page 69 of the record, which has been submitted:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, County of Charleston:

Personally appeared before me G. E. Heape, who, being duly sworn, says that he has seen and read the affidavit of Samuel D. Barshay, dated the 29th day of September, 1913, in which he is erroneously styled "E. G. Heape," and in which affidavit it is stated that he had offered the said Samuel D. Barshay $300 for the use of his upstairs for the use of the same as headquarters for R. S. Whaley, and that furthermore that he spent money in the place of business of the said Samuel D. Barshay to the extent of $16 in the interest of Mr. Whaley and gave a check for it, which check was unpaid, and that the said check is signed "E. G. Heape (R. S. W.)." Deponent admits that he spent money in the place of business of the said Samuel D. Barshay, which is a blind tiger on King Street in the city of Charleston. Deponent denies, however, that he ever had a conversation with the said R. S. Whaley as to the renting of any place as headquarters for him, and he denies his ever having been authorized by Mr. Whaley in any shape or form to rent such a place or to spend any money in his behalf, and that any money or checks given by him were given and used without the knowledge of the said R. S. Whaley, his consent, or ratification, and was the money and check of the said E. G. Heape. He admits that he was a supporter of the said R. S. Whaley, and whatever he did in the interests of the said R. S. Whaley was done on his own personal account as an interested supporter and not at the suggestion, consent, or ratification of the said R. S. Whaley. That if there is any check in the possession of the said Samuel D. Barshay signed "E. G. Heape (R. S. W.)," the part of the said check with the "R. S. W." on it is a forgery and was never placed on the said check by this deponent.

WM. H. GRIMBALL,

Notary Public for South Carolina.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, County of Charleston:

Personally appeared Samuel D. Barshay, who, being duly sworn, made oath that he has read the affidavit of G. E. Heape, dated the 20th of November, 1913, and sworn to before William H. Grimball, a notary public, in which the said G. E. Heape denied the conversation related in deponent's affidavit to Mr. Grace under date of the 29th of September, 1913; that the said G. E. Heape had offered him $300 for the use of his upstairs as headquarters for R. S. Whaley, and that the said G. E. Heape had given him a check for $16 for drinks bought in his place on behalf of Mr. Whaley, said check having been signed "G. E. Heape (R. S. W.)."

Heape (R. S. W.)."

The deponent reiterates and repeats that the said conversation did take place between him and the said Heape, and, further, that when he did refuse, the said Heape offered him $500 for the use of his place for the purpose of headquarters for Mr. Whaley. Deponent also repeats and reiterates that the said G. E. Heape did give him the said check for $16, signed as described, and herewith attaches and makes a part of this affidavit the aforesaid check. This deponent would never have cashed the said check on G. E. Heape's own signature, but it was only because of the additional initials on the check that the same was accepted. And, further, that Theo. Berkman drew the check in his presence and the said G. E. Heape signed the same, as will appear upon more particular reference to the check itself.

The deponent further states that this affidavit is voluntarily given, without any coercion, force, or promise of reward from anyone whom-soever.

I will now read the affidavit of Mr. Frank Fosberry:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, County of Charleston:

I will now read the affidavit of Mr. Frank Fosberry:

Personally appeared Frank Fosberry, 125 Church Street, in the city of Charleston, State and county aforesaid, who being duly sworn deposes and says that he is a qualified elector in the said county and State; that the first primary for the Democratic nomination from the first district of South Carolina was held in Charleston County on Tuesday, April 1, 1913; that for five or six weeks prior to this date he, together with Ignatius Donaghue, 38 Tradd Street, and August Montanese, 215 East Bay Street, city aforesaid, as hall keepers, ran a hall in the said city, which was used as one of the headquarters of Richard S. Whaley, a candidate for the nomination aforesaid; that he, the said Frank Fosberry, and August Montanese received $7 a week for the services so rendered, while Ignatus Donaghue was paid $15 a week for his services; that, in all, he and the said Montanese were paid a total of $70 and Donaghue a total of $75 before the primary aforesaid was held; that for two or three weeks before the said primary whisky and beer and cigars were dispensed without charge each evening to the supporters of the said Richard S. Whaley; that on the morning of April 1 he went to precinct No. 2, ward 3, on State Street, between Queen and Cumberland Streets, and was there met by Thomas Young, of 20 South State Street, city aforesaid, who was wearing a Whaley badge and known as a railier for Whaley; that the said Young had seen him, the said Fosberry, the evening before at Whaley's headquarters and had offered him between twenty and thirty dollars for his vote at the primary on the day following; that the said Young, had seen him, the said Fosberry the evening before at Whaley's headquarters and had offered him only $10 for his vote, but he protested, and then Young gave him $10 with the remark, "That will hold you for awhile"; that same poll and told him he wanted some more money; that the same poll and told him he wanted some more money; that the rand there gave him $10 with were dead broke and begging for a drink; that after Goldman had come and gone each of them had more than $10 apiece.

That the second primary for the Democratic nomination for Congressman from the first district of South Carolina was held in the county of Charleston on Tuesday. April 15, 1913; that he, the said Frank Fosberry, after having voted in his ward, namely, ward 3, went over to the polling booth of ward 2, corner of King and Broad Streets, in the city aforesaid; that there he was met by Thomas J. O'Keefe, 75 King Street, in the city aforesaid, wearing a Whaley badge and acting as a representative of the Whaley interests, and that the said O'Keefe, with his consent, voted him illegally under a fictitious name at the said poll, the said O'Keefe paying him $12 for so voting; that the said O'Keefe also voted in the same way and at the same time his companion, Vincent Fonte, 28 Queen Street, in the city aforesaid, and that he saw the said O'Keefe pay the said Fonte $12 for voting.

That one Jack Lehman, 32 Savage Street, in the city aforesaid, in the second primary and on the day above mentioned, as a representative of Whaley's interests and wearing a Whaley badge, in his presence, voted one man, Joseph Nolan by name, three times at the same poll, precinct 1, ward 3, under fictitious names; that in his presence the said Lehman paid the said Nolan $10 each for the first two votes, but that after the third vote Lehman took the said Nolan down an alley, in sight of the said Fosberry, and passed some bills to the said Nolan, the amount of which could not be ascertained from the distance; that in his presence on the same day and about the same hour at the same poll, namely, precinct 1, ward 3, in his presence, the said Lehman handed $5 to one Max Goldman, 182 King Street, and the said Goldman gave the said $5 to one Vincent Foote, who was standing by the polls.

(Signed) Frank Fosberry.

Now, I want to be absolutely fair with you, and desire to call your attention specially to a counter affidavit made by the same Frank Fosberry, which you will find on page 82 of the record, in which, after reciting the facts of the prior affidavit, he says as follows:

in which, after reciting the facts of the prior affidavit, he says as follows:

That the facts and circumstances under which the deponent signed his name to the statement alleged to be his affidavit, if the same is signed by him, are as follows: That on the day on which said affidavit was made deponent had been drinking, and was in an intoxicated condition in the Atlantic Café, on the corner of State and Market Streets, when he was approached by one C. J. Bresnihan, who asked deponent to have a drink, and deponent too kwo drinks with the said Bresnihan; and then the said Bresnihan invited deponent to go on a joy ride with him in a buggy belonging to the city, which is used by the said C. J. Bresnihan, who is employed by the said city under Mayor Grace, and connected with the street department; that deponent accepted the invitation of the said Bresnihan and got into the buggy, and that his condition at that time was such that he had to be helped out of the café into the buggy and out of the buggy; that the next thing deponent knew was that he had been carried to the office of Mr. Cosgrove, whose office is in the office of Messrs. Logan & Grace, on Broad Street; and deponent denies that he made the statements set out in the said affidavit, and states that the said affidavit had already been partially prepared when he came into the said office, and the same without its being read over to him, and that the statements contained in said affidavit and stated therein to have been made by him were not in fact made by him, and are untrue; that headquarters had been opened in ward 3, and that this deponent, together with Ignatius Donaghue and August Montanese, were employed for the purpose of investigating the club rolls and locating fictitious names, and that deponent was a worker and rallier in said ward for Whaley, and did receive pay for his work as stated; all of which was well known to persons in that ward, but deponent denies that he made the statement therein as to the Illegal use of money, and denies specifically

ERNEST L. VISANSKA,

Notary Public for South Carolina.

And, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fairness, I desire to further report that this record shows that the said Frank Fosberry, on the 1st day of November, 1913, attempted to commit suicide, which you must know was prior to the date of the counter affidavit of December 1, 1913, and subsequent to the first affidavit of September 29, 1913, and I have given you the entire matter in reference to Frank Fosberry. Now, which of his affidavits will you believe? In the second he recites all the facts and circumstances pertaining to the making of the first and that he knew of them—he remembered all about the joy ride, arriving at the office of Mr. Cosgrove, and that a part of the affidavit was made before he arrived. Now, if he knew that a part of it had been written before he got there, it must have been read to him, and it is certainly true that if he knew all about the facts and circumstances pertaining to the making of the affidavit he must have known of the contents of it, and he admits receiving the money, as sworn to in his original affidavit, and that it was well known in the ward that he had received it. Now, again I ask, Which will you believe? The answer naturally must be the first, the one that was made without question, of his own free will and accord, and not the one made after there had been an opportunity to advise him of what the results of the first might be, and probably obtained by duress; and it may be that the conditions existing in reference to the matter had something to do with causing him to attempt his own life on the 1st day of November, 1913,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FREAR. I yield the gentleman five minutes more. Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one question right there?

Mr. BORCHERS. My time is so limited that it will not permit me.

Mr. SISSON. I want to know-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to vield.

Mr. SISSON. But I want to see if the gentleman will yield. Mr. BORCHERS. I have already said that I have not the time to vield.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is not willing to state the facts about that affidavit.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I object to any statement of that

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is out of order and will take his seat.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I did not understand just what the gentleman from Mississippi said in reference to my not stating the truth about the affidavit.

Mr. SISSON. I will give the gentleman the benefit of it. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORCHERS. I will permit the gentleman to make that statement over again.

Mr. SISSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman if it were not a fact that the affidavit which he just read is an affidavit which the man now says was made when he was drunk?

Mr. BORCHERS. I will take care of that, Mr. Speaker. Mr. SISSON. That is the question I wanted to ask-whether that was true or not.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I have already said that on page 82 of the first record will be found the affidavit made by Frank Fosberry and submitted by Mr. Whaley, and I read the last paragraph at the bottom of page 83:

Frank Fosberry and submitted by Mr. Whaley, and I read the last paragraph at the bottom of page S3:

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to continue for 15 minutes more, and that the time for debate be extended for half an hour. This is the first time that I have been on the floor of this House. I have never before taken any of the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of debate be extended for 30 minutes, 15 minutes of which is to go to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] and 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Borchers] desiring 15 minutes of that time for himself. Is there objection?

Mr. POST. I object. Mr. MANN. Oh, give the gentleman half an hour—15 minutes on a side.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a portion of that time for myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman wants 15 minutes of that half hour if extended, and that is part of his request. The Chair supposes it will be charged up to that side. Is there objection?

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand we will get the other 15 minutes on this side?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, Is that the understanding—that 15 minutes will come to this side?

Mr. FREAR. I would like to have part of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is getting 15 minutes. Mr. FREAR. If I get it. I would like some extra time myself when the opportunity comes.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to put the request. The gentleman from Illinois asks that debate be extended 30 minutes, and that he have 15 minutes of that time.
Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I would ask to amend the request by making it one hour, one-half to that side and one-half to this. [Applicase.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that this debate be extended for an hour beyond the original three and a half hours, and that 30 minutes be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Post], 15 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Borchers], and the other 15 minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear]. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not disposed to grant this request unless the gentlemen who are presenting this important matter are willing to yield to Members who want to obtain information about this case. I wanted to ask some questions, and they were questions which really applied to the very merits of this procedure, but the gentleman was unwilling to answer.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object-Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, if gentlemen are going to read speeches and will not yield to gentlemen who want to know about these things, I will have to object. I say that without any feeling whatever-

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say this-want to say this—

The SPEAKER. Wait a minute, and let us straighten this matter out. Does the gentleman from Illinois agree to be catechized if he secures 15 minutes?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not take two minutes.

Mr. BORCHERS. I will attempt to answer the questions.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I will yield of my 15 minutes to answer that continue that continue to ask. I will yield in my any questions that gentlemen desire to ask. I will yield in my 15 minutes for any question gentlemen wish to ask in regard to the record. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not bother the gentleman with his prepared speech, then.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wanted to put a question a moment ago, and I feel that this House is entitled to the facts within the knowledge of this committee; and, if these gentlemen have heard this evidence, those of us who are to vote on it certainly have the right to ask questions. I asked the gentleman about an affidavit which he read and he declined to answer and declined to yield. if we could not get some information about what the affidavit was, what value could I give to it when the gentleman would not yield to me? Mr. COOPER.

Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SISSON. I will.
Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he did not have in his prepared speech a statement of that man's claim that he was drunk?

Mr. FREAR. He read it to you.

Mr. COOPER. He had a statement that this man claimed he was intoxicated, following right along in his written speech, and he started to read-

Mr. SISSON. I did not know anything he would have read, and therefore I asked the question.

Mr. COOPER. He gave it to the gentleman just the same as the printed affidavit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. I am going to object unless the gentleman will answer courteously proper questions that gentlemen will ask him.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not object to that request.

Mr. SISSON. I object, Mr. Speaker. Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Posr] had an hour yesterday afternoon in this House.

Mr. SISSON. I will withdraw the objection if the gentleman will answer the questions that are properly put, and I believe he agrees to do that.

Mr. BORCHERS. I will answer any question I can, but I have not much time.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. SISSON. With that understanding, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will enforce that as fully as he can. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Rese Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, this is the first time the gentleman has addressed this House, and for an old Member to take a part of his time away is an outrage.

[Applause.] The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Borchers] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the time has been extended one hour, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the time has been extended one hour. Mr. BORCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to refer to more affidavits, but I will not have the time.

Now, I admit that many of these things are denied, but I insist that a sufficient amount of evidence has been submitted to the committee to make out a prima facie case and should be investigated. The record shows that more than $40,000 was spent in the campaign in behalf of Candidate Hughes, and that Mayor Grace, the person making the complaint in this case, was one of his principal managers; and the committee sees fit to put much stress on the failure of Policemen Plough and Moore in not having made arrests when they saw the violation of the law, as testified to in their affidavits. How natural it was for them to ignore the violation when it was in the air all about them; when the mayor under whom they were working was one of the principal violators, and they themselves probably had received theirs. Should they have even attempted to make an arrest every sensible person knows that under such conditions it would have worked as a boomerang and would have been fatal to the cause advocated by the man under whom they were employed; and the same conditions existed all over the city of Charleston, and the results would have been the same. When the violations were open and notorious on both sides, it would have been fatal to the cause of the one in authority for him to have used his civic authority to suppress the opposite side. How could be have arrested Alderman Simmons when he himself saw him expending $2,000 in behalf of Mr. Whaley? Just think of the pot calling the skillet black,

They make light of spending the money and debauching the electorate in the blind tiger, in the speak-easy, and the dive, which is an open confession they know nothing of the conduct of elections in our cities, and from their report you must imagine they would look for it in the kitchen, the dining room, or the parlor of the homes or probably in the counting house of the banker. And I am certain that if the population of the city of Charleston is such as to keep and maintain 500 blind tigers, that it is such as might be influenced and even debauched by election money.

Mr. Speaker, they would have you believe from this report that this contest is a contest between a lion and a lamb; they would have you believe it is a contest between an eagle and a Mr. Speaker, they would have you believe it is as the overflow of a volcanic eruption overflowing a molehill in the valley. But nay, nay, Mr. Speaker; it is simply a contest between two men, two human beings, a man on one side and a man on the other. The evidence discloses they have been man on the other. The evidence discloses they have been enemies for years; for years have been striving and struggling to get the better of each other; that when the one was a candidate for mayor of his city, from his own statement, the campaign for which cost him thousands of dollars, the other was his enemy, doing everything within his power to defeat him, and then immediately after, when it was reversed, the latter a candidate for Congress and the former doing his very utmost to defeat him, and on account of which the campaign resolved itself into an expenditure of money. The one shows his con-tempt for the other by words, and one for the other by his silence, his ignoring him and refusing to consider anything from him and refusing to appear before the committee in the other's presence. Mr. Speaker, there is one more affidavit I wish to be considered in this matter and that is the affidavit of H. Frank Hogan.

How natural; I am going to Congress or I am going broke. If there is a word of truth in this case from the beginning to the end, that is the truth. It is borne out in every particular by the very action of both of the principals and the disposition on the part of each for the other for years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have absolutely shown that this report is not based upon the facts, and I know from having given it a considerable attention I could point out many more places where it is absurd, but I am going to content myself with one more reference and in that drive the last nail into its coffin with their own hammer, and if then you are not convinced you are not giving it consideration or you are not open for conviction.

Mr. Speaker-Mr. POST.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BORCHERS. Yes.

Mr. POST. You are mentioning the affidavits of the witness Were you not present at the meeting of the committee when this man Hogan testified and appeared before the committee'

Mr. BORCHERS. I was not.

Mr. POST. I thought not. If you had seen him, you would not have given credence to anything he said.

Mr. BORCHERS. But I have read his evidence just the same, and I have submitted it for what it was worth

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BORCHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. POST. I will ask the gentleman, in all fairness and frankness, if this man Grace did not concede that Peurifoy and Von Kolnitz were opposed to him, and because he was interested in the campaign those votes were cast for Mr. Whaley?

Mr. BORCHERS. I will answer your question in just a mo-

Now, that part of the report which says that Grace conceded that the vote received in the first primary by Von Kolnitz and Peurifoy went to Whaley in the second primary we dispute, and I challenge them to defend it; but, be it as it may, the record shows, at the bottom of page 40, second record, that the sheriff, Mr. Martin, who was the principal supporter of Von Kolnitz and handled his money, was a traitor, and told the people that Von Kolnitz had withdrawn from the race, and it became neces sary for him to ride all over the city to dispute it and get his supporters to come back and support him, and it is hard to believe they would go to Mr. Whaley in the second primary under such conditions. Now, further, figures will not lie, and they have established their case by figures, and naturally they feel secure for that reason, but we will review them. Speaking of the first primary, they say that Peurifoy received 10 votes in the ninth ward and Mr. Von Kolnitz 79, and that if the votes received by Peurifoy. Von Kolnitz, and Whaley in the first primary be added together they aggregate about what Whaley received in the second primary. I desire to give you the vote in full for said ward 9 in both primaries, and it is as follows:

And they further substantiate their report by figures in Mount Pleasant precinct and represent as follows: In the first primary Hughes received 6 votes, Peurifoy 21, Von Kolnitz 78, and Whaley 13, making a total of 118 votes cast; and then in the second primary Hughes received 20 votes and Whaley 91, making a total of 117 votes cast, and show a loss of only 1 vote; and by these figures they have established their contention and made a foundation for their report, and they have established it in a city ward and in an outlying precinct, so it must be correct.

But wait a minute Mr. Speaker before our conclusions are

But wait a minute, Mr. Speaker, before our conclusions are final let us look a little further, and since they established their case in a city ward let us take a look at some other ward. We were in the ninth ward with them, and suppose we now take a trip to the third ward, and especially to club 2, where in the first primary we find there were cast 513 votes and in the second primary there were cast 552 votes, a little gain over the first primary and approximately the same gain as in the ward they illustrated, and, to see whether their contention is correct, let use examine the distribution of the votes of this club in each of the primaries. In the first primary Hughes received 363 votes, Padgett 19, Peurifoy 39, and Von Kolnitz 8, making a total of 66 votes for Padgett, Peurifoy, and Von Kolnitz, and Mr. Whaley received 84, making the grand total of 513 votes; and we will now examine the second primary and see whether they have established their contention in figures in this club. In the second primary I find that Hughes received 495 votes and Mr. Whaley 57, making a total of 552, and I desire to ask the question, Did Mr. Whaley receive the Peurifoy and Von Kolnitz votes? Nay, nay; he did not receive them all, but lost them all, and not only lost them all but lost 27 of his own, and Mr. Hughes, not being satisfied with taking all of the Peurifoy and Von Kolnitz votes and the 27 from Mr. Whaley himself, went upon the highways and byways, down the alleys, and around the corners and got 39 more. Now, since they also took a trip to the outlying precincts, let us go with them again and then go a little farther; and in our journey we might stop at McClellenville, where the balance is slightly in favor of Mr. Hughes, or at Awendaw, where I see Mr. Hughes did not get a single vote in the first primary and where Mr. Whaley got 8, Peurifoy 5, and Von Kolnitz 21, making a total of 34 votes cast, and then in the second primary at Awendaw Mr. Hughes got 38 votes and Mr. Whaley got but 1, making a total of 39, a gain of 5 votes over the first primary; but these figures are too hard to explain and understand, and we will go a little farther and stop at Edisto Island, where the votes are easier to comprehend and where I also see that Mr. Hughes did not receive a single vote in the first primary and where Mr. Whaley received 17 and our friend Mr. Von Kolnitz received 10, making a total of 27 votes cast, and then in the second primary I see that Mr. Hughes got 10 votes and Mr. Whaley got the same 17, making the same total of 27 votes cast, and the 10 votes received by Mr. Hughes in the second primary must have been the same as the 10 received by Mr. Von Kolnitz in the first. Now, on the basis of figures I am certain I have demonstrated that this report is absolutely ridiculous, and if I have not I will always believe figures will lie.

I am inclined to believe and do believe that the feeling of the majority of the committee against Mr. Grace is too much embodied in this report, and that they are prejudiced against the case on account of their feelings toward him. I am ready to confess that I was not the most impressed by him, but I can not let that interfere with my duty, and especially when so much other evidence was produced before the committee.

I have naught but the kindliest feelings toward the gentleman from South Carolina, and it is my wish that when the facts are known they will establish his innocence beyond any doubt; but I insist that I desire to see him have possession without a cloud on the title. I sympathize with South Carolina, but in so doing I remember Illinois. Illinois, Illinois, she has had her shame and sorrow, and on account of which some new faces are now seen in the United States Senate, and on account of present conditions it will be sufficient for me to say that two are from the State of Illinois, one a Democrat and one a Republican, each having the indorsement of his party by the vote of the people in a State primary; that chairs in that historic Chamber occupied for years—yes, a generation and even more by national characters of renown now have other occupants.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOPCHERS. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield any longer. The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield. Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I will yield if the gentleman will ask the question in my time.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR! has not the floor.

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BORCHERS] yield to the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. BORCHERS. I have not the time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BORCHERS. The primary was as a battle field and the old guard was completely driven from their stronghold; they were completely routed and driven from the field and nothing was left but remnants with the people in possession.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORCHERS. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to vield.

Mr. BORCHERS. It has been Democratic principles for years for publicity of campaign expenses and contributions, and is it possible that now at this first opportunity we are going to repudiate it? I say no, and Illinois sends South Carolina the message, "Turn on the light, draw aside the curtains, lift the veil, and let the rays of your southern sunshine penetrate the innermost circles of your first congressional district and let the people know the truth."

If you do not, and you adopt the resolution introduced by the majority and thereby approve this report when it is absolutely ridiculous on its face, I am certain the people, not only of the first congressional district of South Carolina but other districts of the State and others of the United States, will resent it, and on account of which some new faces will be seen in the Sixtyfourth Congress, and if they do not resent it you might as well close these doors, brace them with iron rods, and inscribe on the outside thereof in golden letters, "None shall enter here, unless he rides in a golden chariot, and he shall be first whose vehicle represents the most dollars, either by personal ownership or most susceptible to its influence."

Mr. Speaker, I again repeat, it is a painful duty to disagree with your committee, but when a man faces a serious issue and performs a duty that he might desire to put aside, there comes to him afterwards that quiet satisfaction and sweet contentment that comes to one who has resolutely performed what he conceives to be his duty.

And now, having done what I believe to be right in this case, I am content to leave the matter with the House, with the hope that the substitute resolution will be adopted and the facts investigated. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague

[Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I think that it is the highest ambition of every Member of this body, so far as his ambition has to do with the membership of this House, to stand for a policy that will mean clean men here, that will mean the upholding of our election laws, that will mean that in every congressional district in this Nation those laws shall be observed in a fair and orderly way, and that men chosen by the people in an honorable manner shall be sent here.

I can not think that at any time any considerable number of the membership of this House were elected by corrupt means, but in order to meet the few cases where corrupt practices were followed in securing election to membership in this body the Congress passed, and I am proud that I had part in passing, certain corrupt-practices acts, looking to the end that those who may be elected here shall come with clean hands, that thereby the best Representatives may be selected to this body from the different congressional districts, and that the public confidence of the people of this country be placed in those who are elected to serve them in legislative capacity.

The case that we are called upon to consider at this time rests upon Mr. Grace's charges, and if those charges were to be sustained, for my part I have no hesitancy in saying that I would close the doors of this Chamber upon the back of the Member of Congress elected, Mr. Whaley.

Again, I do not find myself in sympathy with the suggestion that has been made that the Members of this Congress are not called upon to consider this case because the charges were not brought within a short time following the election of Mr. Whaley. The fact of the business is, notwithstanding that the House could have examined the case probably better if the charges had been filed earlier, I believe, that if after a time ordinarily allowed by the House or if now it were to appear that the condition alleged to have existed really did exist, we would owe it to ourselves to expel Mr. Whaley from this Chamright there?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman understands, and has just stated very plainly, that we can not only try the title of a Member on a contest proceeding prescribed by statute, but the House, exercising its inherent power, has the right to determine that title by the judgment of its own membership, and can act in that way. That is the gentleman's suggestion. But I want to invite the attention of the gentleman to this; Can the House, or a committee of the House, undertake an investigation of this kind unless there is some Member of the House who presents a resolution challenging the title of a Member to his seat? Or are there other ways by which the House, at the instance of somebody else, can challenge the title of a Member to his seat except by means of a contest provided for by law or by a resolution introduced by some responsible Member of this body? And if that has not been done in this case, why?

Mr. FRENCH. If it has not been done in this case, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, and if it had been brought to the attention of the committee and the charges reasonably sustained. I myself would have been one, at least, to bring the resolution into the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. But no such resolution has been pre-sented by anybody. Will the gentleman answer my question, please?

Mr. FRENCH. It is for the House to determine now whether an investigation shall be ordered.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interrupt the gentleman, but I will say that that has been done by private individuals in cases that have been sustained by decisions of Speaker Crisp himself, the father of one of the members of the committee. I forget what the gentleman's second question was, Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman says a resolution was presented by a private individual?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and by Speaker Crisp it was recognized

Mr. MANN. It has been done several times.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Idaho yield to all these gentlemen?

Mr. FRENCH. I decline to yield further, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FRENCH. The fact, however, is that the very serious character of these charges challenges the membership of this House and brings us face to face with the duty that we owe to the people whom we represent and to the constituency involved in South Carolina and to Mr. Whaley himself, who is personally interested in this case.

Now, let us go into the case and see what we shall find in a very brief time. This case is brought to our attention by the mayor of the city of Charleston, Mr. Grace. Mr. Grace, in his testimony before the committee, admitted that he and Mr. Whaley had been personal enemies for many years. After the special election occurred and when the certificate of election was sent here, Mr. Grace followed it with all the haste in his power to present to this Congress a request that Mr. Whaley be not permitted to take the oath of office. He went to Senator TILLMAN, and Senator TILLMAN referred him back to the House, because he was not a Member of this body.

He then went to Representative Johnson of South Carolina, from his own State, and a man whom he had known for years, and after he had gone to him and asked him to intercede or ask that the oath be not administered to Mr. Whaley, Mr. Johnson told him, as will be seen on page 58 of the record of the testimony of Mr. Grace, "I have nothing to go on," and Mr. Grace immediately replied to Mr. Johnson, "I know it is so, but I could not tell positively that it was so; I could not get up and swear that he spent $5,000."

In other words, Mr. Grace was willing to come here and ask that this House deny administering the oath of office to a man when he himself, when he came here, was not possessed of facts even in his own mind sufficient to make that statement. oath was administered, the petition of Mr. Grace was filed, and Mr. Grace then sought to support it.

Mr. Grace's affidavit from beginning to end is almost entirely hearsay evidence, and especially so as it pertains to all counties outside of the county of Charleston.

Now, what of the charges? It is set forth in the petition of Hon. John P. Grace that Representative Whaley expended something like $60,000 or more for the purpose of procuring his election, while as a matter of fact the law permitted him to expend not to exceed $5,000, aside from personal expenses, and required him to make an itemized account of his expenses. Mr. Whaley filed his expense account, and it shows he expended much less than $5,000.

We have a corrupt-practices act, and if Mr. Whaley expended the amount that it is claimed he did expend, or if he expended one-tenth of that amount in the ways that it is alleged he expended it, he is guilty of violating the law. It becomes, then, important to consider well the charges that are brought against Mr. Whaley. It is unfortunate that the committee to which this matter was referred was not clothed with power to subpœna witnesses, to cross-examine them, and to learn at first hand whatever evidence they might be prepared to offer. mittee, however, had no such power. The committee was compelled to consider the evidence of those witnesses, both for and against Mr. Whaley, who voluntarily presented themselves, and to consider the affidavits submitted in support of Mr. Whaley and in opposition to him that were offered to the committee. The only way that the committee could have gone further would have been, as I understand it, by calling upon the Congress to order an investigation, and it was for the purpose of determining whether or not a sufficient amount of evidence had been placed with the committee to warrant the committee in so reporting to this House that the committee spent many days in a most careful inquiry and consideration of the matters submitted in the case.

The petitioner, Mr. Grace, does not claim to be able to testify to much that is material, but his petition is based upon hearsay to much that is material, but his petition is based upon hearsay to make the confined to the city of evidence. This hearsny evidence is not confined to the city of Charleston, but extends to all the counties in the congressional district that is represented by Mr. Whaley.

Before I take up the matter of this evidence I want to call attention to the petitioner in this case, Mr. Grace, and to the conditions that exist in Charleston. Mr. Grace is the mayor of that city. He stands at the head of a faction that has contended in the past for the control of the city government. He admitted before the committee, I say-he almost boasted before the committee—that the contest that involved the election of Mr. Whaley was rather one that had to do with his own domi-Mr. Whatey was rather one that had to do with his own dominance of the affairs of the city of Charleston. He says that he advised his friends that the fight, although it was made in the name of Mr. Whaley and Mr. Hughes, who was Mr. Whaley's opponent, as a matter of fact, was an anti-Grace fight. In other words, Mr. Grace was interested in this matter, not necessarily on account of the conditions that surrounded the election of Mr. Whaley, but because he is the leader of a faction fighting for supremacy in the city of Charleston.

I do not challenge the earnestness of Mr. Grace, but I do believe that he is a man who in this matter has been governed by such personal animosity and personal hate and self-interest that he permitted himself to follow and to urge a course that, if it were applied to any other man in the whole universe, Mr. Grace himself would be bound to admit was not worthy of being followed. Naturally enough no member of the South Carolina delegation could be found who was willing to come before this House and upon the responsibility of himself as a Member charge that Mr. Whaley had violated the election laws in obtaining his election to this body.

But let us go further. The petition of Mr. Grace rests almost entirely upon hearsay evidence. The chief witness that he relies upon is H. Leon Larisey.

Now, let us for a moment see who H. Leon Larisey is. H. Leon Larisey wanted to be a candidate for Congress in the first primary himself. He wanted the support of Mr. Grace.

Mr. Grace refused to support him, and supported another man, Mr. Larisey then went to Mr. Whaley and asked Mr. Whaley to pay $500 for him, the amount of the candidate's fee under the South Carolina law. Mr. Whaley refused to do it. The argument of Mr. Larisey was that if Mr. Whaley would do that it would keep him in the race and consequently increase Whaley's chances. Larisey followed Mr. Whaley to the State capitol, where Mr. Whaley was speaker of the house. There, one night, until along in the early hours of the morning, he urged this particular course upon Mr. Whaley, but was refused constantly and firmly by Mr. Whaley, who did not desire to participate in that kind of campaign. He had known Mr. Whaley for years. If Mr. Whaley was the kind of man that he later declared him to be, why should he want to further his interest and elect him to Congress?

We next find Larisey operating as the agent of Mr. Grace. He is the man who desired to aid in Mr. Whaley's election, and then placed himself and his services under Mr. Grace, and for the consideration of $600 or $700 traveled over the district and obtained the evidence that he set forth in his affidavit. His evidence is almost entirely hearsay. No other view can be taken of the testimony that Mr. Larisey submits.

At this time I want to call your attention to Mr. Larisey's statement.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POST. I yield to the gentleman 5 minutes. Mr. FRENCH. May I have 10 minutes?

Mr. POST. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes. Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Larisey alleges that in Dorchester County Mr. Whaley spent $6,000; in Clarendon County, $5,000; in Colleton County, $6,000; in Berkeley County, $2,900; that he promised the post office at Manning to two different persons and then did not give it to either one. Now let us go around and follow the trail that Mr. Larisey has made through these several counties and see what the people there have to say of Mr. Larisey. Mr. Larisey had run for Congress in the last campaign made by our late friend, Mr. Legare.

Mr. Larisey covered the counties of the district and he met and conversed with many men. He made statements that vari-and conversed with many men. He made statements that various citizens of the district would testify in some particular manner. Now let us see what some of the citizens of the district think of Mr. Larisey.

Mr. D. B. Purifoy is a citizen of Colleton County, S. C. He is an attorney and one of the most prominent citizens of that county. He is the brother of Mr. Purifoy, who in the first primary was a candidate for the congressional nomination against Mr. Whaley, On page 98 of the hearings Mr. Purifoy Deponent has found him (Larisey) anything but honest, a stranger to the truth, and deponent would not believe him on cath.

Dr. W. B. Ackerman is another citizen of Colleton County. He is a practicing physician; one of the most prominent and responsible citizens of the community. He is the mayor of the town of Walterboro, and on page 99 of the testimony he says:

H. L. Larisey has always borne the reputation of being a crook and a swindler and willing to do most anything for the dollar. Deponent knows his reputation for truth and veracity and would not believe him on oath.

On page 102 of the report Mr. D. M. Bradham, a responsible citizen of the county of Clarendon, characterizes the statement of Mr. Larisey with regard to him as "absolutely false."

Mr. O. C. Scarborough, another prominent citizen of the county of Clarendon, who had been honored by his people by election to the legislature, says that Mr. Larisey's statement untrue and a deliberate faislification of the facts; and, moreover, I wish to state that I would not believe the said Leon Larisey on his oath.

I could go much further than this, but I shall submit only one further statement, the statement of Dr. George W. Dick, one of the most prominent and responsible citizens of Sumter County. He says that he-could not believe Mr. Larisey under any circumstances, on any subject, on any occasion connected with life or death, the present, or the hereafter.

This is the man who had first wanted to support Mr. Whaley by being a candidate against Mr. Grace's candidate, and who then for pay circulated throughout the various counties of the district and obtained the evidence largely upon which this case rests.

I mention those who characterize him in the manner that I have indicated, together with their characterizations, because upon Mr. Larisev rests the responsibility in most of the district outside of Charleston of sustaining whatever there may be of accusation against Mr. Whaley. Upon the statements of this man we are asked to send a committee to inquire into the allegations that he makes.

The committee received his evidence. It was published; and I must say that from an examination that I have made in every instance, I believe, there is an absolute denial under oath of the statements made by Mr. Larisey touching the illegal expenditure of money. The deal that was alleged to have been made with regard to the Manning post office is also denied, and denied by Mr. Whaley.

I submit that as respects all of this case, outside of the city of Charleston, there is absolutely not one thing to warrant this House or a committee of this House in even considering the question of investigating the charges of Mr. Larisey. The charges have fallen so absolutely upon the inquiry made by the committee that I do not believe this Congress ought to be called upon to spend the time and the money to make a further investigation.

When Mr. Larisey alleges that this large sum of money was spent, that it was spent through certain responsible men of the different counties that he mentions, and when this allegation of Mr. Larisey is purely hearsay, and when his general reputation is that which it is established before the committee to be, and when, in addition to that, every important allegation that he makes is absolutely denied by those that he involves, I submit that there is nothing left for the House to do but to dismiss the charges as pertain to this part of the case.

Now let us go to the city and county of Charleston. already indicated that a very bitter contest exists in the city of Charleston for the control of the city government. The chief witness before the committee, Mr. Grace, admitted that, and he admitted that the fight was really a fight for the control of power and prestige within the city. There were undoubtedly lined up on one side the partisans and adherents of Mr. Grace, and there were lined up on the other side the partisans and adherents of Mr. Whaley, and I assume in his support were lined up all the elements that were antagonistic to Mr. Grace as the head of the political organization that controls the city of Charleston.

The fight was undoubtedly bitter, and undoubtedly money was spent in behalf of both sides in the contest. Charges have been made by Mr. Grace of the vast expenditure of money upon the part of Mr. Whaley. These charges have been supported by numerous witnesses, and it is very interesting to inquire into some of the facts surrounding the evidence that is furnished by these several witnesses. Mr. Grace should have brought to the committee the best witnesses he had.

One of the witnesses who was produced before the committee by Mr. Grace was Mr. H. F. Hogan. Mr. Hogan was a supporter of Hughes, the opponent of Mr. Whaley. He boastingly announced to the committee that he was an experienced politician; but who was he? He was formerly a "blind-tiger" keeper in the city of Charleston. He was commonly known as "Rumpty Rattles" Hogan, a man who conducted so notorious a dive in the city of Charleston that the governor was compelled, over the protest of Mayor John P. Grace, to eradicate his place of business. After this was done Mr. Grace promptly took care of him upon the city pay rolls.

Mr. Grace produced another witness before the committee Mr. M. J. Barry. He, too, was formerly a keeper of a "blind tiger," and after Mr. Grace was elected mayor he was promoted from the position of blind-tiger keeper—or, as we would call it in my State, a "bootlegger"—to a position as foreman on the streets. He was a man who prior to his appointment to this position had been frequently arrested, and, to use his own words, "frequently got out and spread the joy."

Another witness that Mr. Grace brought before the committee was Mr. Stephen D. Sargent. Sargent was a boiler inspector upon the Atlantic Coast Line, and he testified that he had worked in the second primary in the interest of Mr. Hughes, who was the candidate of Mr. Grace, and he testified that he purchased votes in Mr. Hughes's behalf. He testified that he spent as high as $60 in the purchase of a single vote. In addition to that we have the testimony of Mr. Grace himself and Mr. Larisey, of whom I have already spoken, on account of the fact that he was the one selected to collect the evidence from the other counties that made up the district. Aside from that, there were submitted by Mr. Grace a large number of affidavits, and it might be interesting for me to call attention to some of those who furnished affidavits in behalf of Mr. Grace.

Philip Fash was one. His testimony was wholly hearsay, and he is the keeper of a blind tiger, a bootlegger, a man who, under Mayor Grace, is operating in violation of the law. Another man was Michael Bazarr. Michael Bazarr made a very strong affidavit in behalf of Mr. Grace, but he made a second affidavit denying the statements contained in his first affidavit, declaring that he is a foreigner and that he can not read or write the English language.

Another affidavit was made by Robert Swart; but Robert Swart made a second affidavit setting forth that he had not signed any paper whatever in connection with the controversy and that the statements that were contained in the first alleged affidavit were not true.

Another affidavit that Mr. Grace brought to the committee was made by William Singletary. This unfortunate young man, it is brought out, is scarcely more than a boy and was characterized by one of his own friends before the committee as being "addle-pated."

Another affidavit was presented by Frank Fosberry. This affidavit makes very startling accusations against several of the citizens of the city of Charleston; but who is Frank Fosberry? He is an unfortunate young man, addicted to strong drink, and who filed a counter affidavit charging that if his name is affixed to any affidavit submitted by Mr. Grace that it was obtained when he was in an intoxicated condition and that he did not understand the import of the paper that he had signed. The first affidavit was obtained by Mr. C. J. Bresnihan, who is on the city's pay roll, serving as superintendent of garbage of the city. He is the man who brought Mr. Fosberry in his buggy to the office of Mr. Cosgrove, the law partner of Mr. Grace, where the affidavit was prepared. He denies that Fosberry was drunk, but he admits that while he was on the way, after he had gotten Mr. Fosberry into his buggy and was taking him to Cosgrove's office to make out the affidavit, that he got out and went into the Atlantic Café, in connection with which an and went into the Atlantic Care, in connection with which an illegal saloon was being conducted, and that he there bought for the said Fosberry a drink of liquor. He denies that Fosberry was drunk and Mr. Cosgrove denies it, before whom the affidavit was made, but nevertheless it is admitted by Mr. Bresnihan that just before taking him to make the affidavit he paid for at least one drink for Mr. Fosberry. Mr. Fosberry he paid for at least one drink for Mr. Fosberry. Mr. Fosberry says that he was partially drunk and that he obtained, I believe it is, two drinks for which Mr. Bresnihan paid. After this, this same man Fosberry went back to Mr. Cosgrove, hoping for still further reward, and asked Mr. Cosgrove for money. Mr. Cosgrove, who had, as a notary, helped in the preparation of the affidavit, gave him a quarter and sent him on to Mr. Grace. It is apparent that the affidavit made by this poor man was an affidavit made in the hope of a reward.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. POST. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FRENCH. I have said what I have because I think it is important that the House consider some of the witnesses that were relied upon and that were brought before the committee by Mr. Grace. I do not like to call attention in this way to the evidence that was submitted, but I feel that it is my duty, and I am doing so that you may have such facts before you to consider.

There is evidence submitted from other men, men who are, I believe, reliable and trustworthy, but not evidence of a character that I think warrants any investigation upon the part of the committee or this Congress. I believe after an examination of the evidence submitted by these men and after an examination of the rebuttal evidence, considering the type of men who at once made these denials, that there is not with the House any such facts as would warrant an investigation.

I believe that a very tense condition exists in the city of Charleston. I believe that upon the one side have been arrayed a large majority of the dive keepers and bootleggers of that city who are to-day violating the law and who are interested in the perpetuation in power of a political machine that will permit them to continue to violate the law. Some of such bootleggers have been rewarded by being given places in the employ of the city at whose head is Mayor Grace, and I believe that against this element in the city there is arrayed, for the most part, the better element of that city, working for good government, striving to elect Mr. Whaley to Congress, and that they, together with those who work with them in the country districts, were successful in carrying the election. In view of this, I believe that it is our bounden duty as Members of this Congress to refuse to give the encouragement to those who have fought good government, as I believe, by throwing a cloud upon the good name of a man who has been elected to this body.

I am a Republican. Mr. Whaley is not a member of my party; he is a Democrat. From a partisan standpoint it would be a sweet morsel to have the good name of a Democrat as-sailed and to have an investigation conducted against a member of the dominant party of the House of Representatives; but, gentlemen, there is a duty that I owe to this House, that I owe to Mr. Whaley regardless of politics, that I owe to his constituency and the man, and that is to stand for the truth where I find it and to stand against the false where I see it appear. With that in view, as a member of the committee that has given painstaking examination of the facts in this case, I can not see how we are warranted in proceeding further, and I believe that the charges ought to be dismissed.

There is one feature of the case that I can not fail to call attention to in brief manner, and that is the statement made by Mr. Grace himself, and supported in part by other witness that Mr. Hughes, the candidate for the nomination against Mr. Whaley, expended $44,500. Mr. Grace says that he believes that this expenditure upon the part of Mr. Hughes was made for the most part by Mr. Hughes. He says that he himself had put all the money into politics that he felt he could, and it is his judgment, as the man who admits that he was practically the manager of the campaign against Mr. Whaley and in behalf of Mr. Hughes, that Mr. Hughes advanced practically all this money himself. Mr. Speaker, the corrupt-practices act applies to those who are candidates for Congress and who fail of election just as it applies to candidates for Congress who have been successful in election. It is true this Congress has the authority to proceed against its own Members, while it does not have the authority to proceed against candidates who may be defeated. Whatever action shall be taken to sustain the present law as against candidates who have failed of election must be taken by the Department of Justice and not by Congress. I do not know but that our law ought to be amended in some way. In fact, my judgment is that it ought to be amended in some way so that it would be the duty of the Department of Justice to proceed against those who violate the law, whether they be elected to this body or, as candidates, are not elected.

While I have come to the conclusion that I have in the present case, and while that conclusion sustains Mr. Whaley, I have also considered the question of improving our corruptpractices act, and I want to urge upon this Congress and upon the committees that will have immediately in charge bills that will have to do with the purification of our elections, the importance of such provisions as will make candidates who fail of election as responsible under the law as those who may be

I want to see the time come in this country when in every State the people generally may have confidence in the elections that are held; confidence in the machinery of Government; and confidence in those, regardless of party, who may be entrusted with responsibility.

To that end, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have a double duty here. One is to sustain a good man elected to Congress, and the other is to punish those who violate the law.

even though they go down to defeat. [Applause.]
The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from The time of the gentleman from Idaho has again expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be notified when I have consumed one hour.

I can not think of any better argument to be offered for the minority than that to which the House has just listened, and I am very grateful to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. French] for the statement he has made. I concede it is immaterial to us who is to be investigated. The fact is that political rottenness and corruption exists which is almost unbelievable, and we ask you to not smother this investigation and not attempt to whitewash it, but to investigate the facts.

While I believe the facts make a prima facie case that requires thorough investigation I am not concerned with the and trust he will be vindicated if, after a genuine, honest investigation, the facts so warrant. However, he should fairly and squarely meet those charges, in justice to himself and in justice to the House.

What I say may have little influence in setting aside the majority report, yet, after listening to all the evidence, it appears to be a plain duty to present my differing conclusions, and I shall be content to do so, whatever may be the decision of this body.

Democrats and Republicans alike are found with both the majority and the minority reports, but in order that motives in this connection may not fairly be questioned let me further say in a personal way that there now sits across the aisle a Democratic Member from Wisconsin whose district once gave him only five contested votes more than his Republican op-ponent, the then sitting Member. The State board of can-vassers disagreed. As chairman of that board, I believed the Democrat was entitled to his seat, and so cast the deciding vote in his favor. Five votes out of more than 26,000 was a small margin, but, although the decision was against a member of my party, and in favor of a stranger, I believed it to be just. This proceeding should rise above partisanship.

We are to determine whether any investigation will be had where charges of corruption and violation of law are filed by a private citizen against a Member, no contestant having appeared to challenge the seat.

CHARGES OF CORRUPTION AGAINST WHALEY.

Mayor Grace, of Charleston, has presented charges that $60,000 was spent illegally for the corruption of voters by Richard S. Whaley at the special election held in the first district of South Carolina to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Congressman Legare. The charges were offered to three Mem-Congressman Legare. The charges were offered to three Members of the House, all of whom refused to present them; and then, on the advice of Senator TILLMAN, the charges were filed with the Clerk of the House. These charges, duly verified, were referred by the Speaker to Elections Committee No. 1, a committee that under the law has no power to subpæna a witness.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.
Mr. POST. I want to ask the gentleman, in all candor, after listening to this man Grace and hearing his argument and testi-mony before the committee, if the gentleman did not believe seriously the whole controversy was actuated by malice and his spite against Mr. Whaley?

Mr. FREAR. Is that the end of the question, for I can not yield again? I will answer, in all fairness, I do not.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. FREAR. Well, for a question.

Mr. POST. Did not we give Mr. Grace ample opportunity; did not we treat him with extreme courtesy in every respect?

Mr. FREAR. I think not; but I will come to that a little later to show how he was treated. I thought at times he was treated very unfairly, and I will tell the gentleman from Ohio why. We did not give him the subpæna he asked for; he had to bring witnesses at his own expense.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. FREAR. I am not through. You said to him, you must bring in facts, evidence that we will accept here, not hearsay. So consequently he had to bring-

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I am not through. Mr. Spea any further interruption, but I will yield later. Mr. Speaker, I object to

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield. Mr. FREAR. The testimony shows that $100,000 was spent in two primaries by the two Democratic candidates, Hughes and Whaley, that money flowed like water, that men were bought and sold like sheep, and that this debauched condition of affairs existed throughout the district. Names of men who were bought and names of buyers were furnished; also amounts paid to different men and amounts allotted to each ward or precinct. It was specifically charged that an expenditure of $60,000 was made by the Whaley faction with Mr. Whaley's knowledge and consent, and testimony was given to that effect.

Although notified of every hearing, Mr. Whaley refused to appear and face his accusers, but one day during their absence the committee was called together to hear Mr. Whaley make a brief statement and to permit him to file counter affidavits in his own defense. The committee never had power to do anything, and now reports back to the House it wants no power and does not believe an investigation desirable.

I can not hope to fairly present the issue in the brief time allotted, because the record alone covers over 200 printed pages, and it would require an hour or more to point out and discuss many misstatements of evidence contained in the majority report establishment or failure of the charges against Mr. Whaley of 25 printed pages. My own views have been briefly set forth in a minority statement filed with the report, and I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks the election returns contained in those views, and also a synopsis of the corruptpractices acts

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the election returns and also a brief synopsis of the corrupt-practices acts. Is there objection?

Mr. ELDER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman insists on taking the position he does, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Elder] objects.

Mr. FREAR. I question if there is a quorum here. I have offered to answer the gentleman at the conclusion of my remarks. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana had a perfect right to object without any question being raised about it. Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count.

The SPEAKER proceeded to count.

Mr. FREAR. And I shall continue it daily, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of no quorum.

Mr. ELDER. I will say the gentleman from Wisconsin is so unfair to the chairman in connection with his refusal to permit a question that it causes me to make the objection.

Mr. FREAR. I did not intend any reflection at all, and I intend to answer any questions afterwards.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman did not intend any offense.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELDER] withdraw his objection?

Mr. ELDER. I will not. Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] will withdraw his point of no quorum, anyhow.

Mr. FREAR. I will do so. Mr. POST. The gentleman who has the floor is the one who suggested there was no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. I was addressing myself to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear], and I wish the other gentleman would withdraw his objection to printing the corrupt practices act. If we would all read it, it would do us good.

Mr. ELDER. The trouble is we will go to the expense of printing it and no one will read it.

Mr. FREAR. I think some will read it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELDER] insist on his objection?

Mr. ELDER. In order to obviate any difficulty, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection. Is there objection to the request for printing made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I am not conscious of any bias for or against Mr. Whaley or Mr. Grace. I do believe justice should be measured out impartially whatever the result, and however difficult it may be, through friendship and associations, to impartially pass upon the rights of one of our own number, we ought to perform that duty.

Aside from 64 affidavits from citizens of the first South Carolina district the charges are supported by the direct testimony of seven witnesses who came here at the committee's invitation, but at their own expense, who testified for the purpose of securing an investigation into the facts, not to determine the guilt or innocence of Mr. Whaley; to furnish evidence that would necessarily be reviewed and carefully weighed during any investigation that might be had. For the majority report to intimate that such evidence is unreliable, where no motive is apparent therefor, is to insult our intelligence and suggest other reasons for reaching the conclusions found in the report.

Of the seven witnesses produced by Mayor Grace, including himself, five were fair, open, and, I believe, reliable witnesses; not disputed in any important particular by any credible affidavit nor by Mr. Whaley, who refused to face his accusers, who never testified under oath, and whose strong forte was a violent ignorance of political conditions which surrounded him in his own district.

The two remaining witnesses, one a former candidate for Congress, were each disputed on important points in affidavits furnished by Mr. Whaley, and on matters that can be ascertained only through an investigation. The major ty report, while assailing Mayor Grace for regulating "blind tigers" by systematic fines—an altogether irrelevant proposition—failed to state that blind tigers were inaugurated in Charleston by Mr.

Whaley's own brother-in-law, Mayor Grace's predecessor in office; that it is a custom countenanced by the governor of South Carolina, a custom enforced by Brant Whitlock in Ohio, according to proof offered to the committee, and a custom that annually orings fines aggregating over $32,000 into the Charleston treasury, although I do not defend that practice.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. FREAR. In just a moment.

Mr. PREAR. In just a moment.

Mr. POST. I can not let go unchallenged the assertion that Brand Whitlock, a man celebrated as he is not only in the State of Ohio but throughout the Union, ever permitted such a thing in the city of Toledo.

Mr. FREAR. It was in evidence offered to the committee by Mayor Grace; but I do not care to enter into that now.

Mr. POST. That statement was made by the man Grace? Mr. FREAR. By unconscious misstatements of evidence and juggling of figures and facts, that could be unraveled if time a flugging of figures and facts, that could be unfavered if the afforded, the majority report, in order to justify its conclusions, has created some confusion as to the real issue. It has sought to divert attention from Mr. Whaley and the last elections or in the could be a supplying and the last elections of the could be a supplying and the last elections. Grace and the "blind-tiger" evil. It avoids overwhelming evidence of the wholesale purchase of votes at the last primary and of Mayor Grace's repeated request for permission to furnish the most prominent men in Charleston and other counties as witnesses of political conditions, men who would testify to the truth, but who could not voluntarily undertake unknown personal expense or invite needless personal annoyance and trouble unless properly subpænaed; but we were helpless and without any authority.

A committee with no power to summon, protests that it does not want the right of subpæna; it does not want the entire facts; and this House will be helpless to intelligently pass upon the extent of Mr. Whaley's culpability and violations of the corrupt-practices act until it compels this committee or some other committee to ascertain the facts. Will the House investigate charges when the violation of law vitally concerns its own mem-

THE FEDERAL ACT IS A FARCE.

The corrupt-practices law is notoriously weak. It provides a $5,000 limitation for campaign expenses of Congressmen, yet it excepts practically all necessary expenditures from that amount. All personal expenses, all postage, all circularizing and printing other than newspaper advertising, all telephone and telegraphing-these expenditures are all excepted, and, in fact, anywhere from $5,000 to $50,000 or more can be legitimately spent under law. The law does not limit any proper expense, nor can we seriously contend it was ever intended to do so. From that standpoint the law is weak and indefensible.

However, it does reach this case, because the law does not except from its provisions bribery, corruption, and rottenness almost unbelievable; a condition worse, if possible, than recently occurred in Adams County, Ohio, where hundreds of electors were disfranchised upon their confession of wholesale bribery.

If the law does not here apply, then when and where will it be enforced? How can evidence ever be presented to the House without any investigation? How can perjury ever be assigned against an untrue expense statement if we refuse to permit any investigation?

IN STATES WHERE ONLY DEMOCRATS CAN VOTE.

Complaint is made in the majority report because no contestant has appeared in this case. No contestant can appear or ever will appear in any congressional district in South Carolina, in Georgia, in Mississippi, in Louisiana, or in any other State where only one party exists. In these States the corruptpractices law is null and void unless some private citizen files charges, because all contests are settled between members of the same party in the primary. No opposition occurs at any election and no defeated primary candidate has any status before this House. No matter how corrupt conditions may beand they could not be much worse than in Mr. Whaley's district-the law will always be a dead letter in such States unless charges of its violation, when filed by private citizens, confer jurisdiction.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. FREAR. I will yield at the conclusion of my remarks.

Then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GUDGER. The question I have in mind is in connection with a matter that the gentleman refers to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. GUDGER. I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there have been from one to two contests from South Carolina here for the last 10 years.

Mr. FREAR. Let me reply to the gentleman from North Carolina. I can not yield longer, but if the gentleman will consult the returns he will find that I am correct—that there has not been a single contest in a single district in the Southern States named in the last election. No opposition occurred to the Democratic candidates. I realize what used to be true in past times, but you have stopped it now.

Mr. GUDGER. Just one moment, if the gentleman please.

Mr. FREAR. I know what the gentleman means.

Mr. GUDGER. What I mean to say is, that as to contests, I have been here 10 years, and-

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield further. I know what the facts are. You used to have election contests down there, but you have none now, because there was no opposition at the last election in a single district in the States named.

Mr. GUDGER. That may be true as to the last election.

Mr. FREAR. If these charges have been properly filed, then, in view of the evidence submitted, the committee's action is startling, because of the precedent about to be established; startling in its effort to smother an investigation by words and to acquiesce in the violation of a law that can never be enforced without an investigation.

Little evidence can be presented in the brief time allotted beyond showing that seven witnesses appeared before the committee-straightforward witnesses, who testified without reservation. Sergeant, who squarely answered every question, spent $1,000 in ward 9. Hogan testified he spent $2,800 in the same ward, all for Hughes, who opposed Whaley. Whaley had 75 ralliers or ward heelers in that ward, all under pay for several days; men who were paid from $10 to $50 apiece, according to influence possessed. Sergeant swore that Whaley spent twice as much as Hughes. Practically every ward had a swarm of Hughes and Whaley ralliers; the vote was evenly divided, and yet Hughes spent $44,500 in a losing fight. Testimony was offered that at every crossroads in the 176 precincts Whaley votes brought from $10 to $15 each.

Scores of witnesses gave names of many men who were buying votes for Whaley. Efforts to impeach opposing witnes by affidavits were flimsy, aside from the police records furnished concerning several of Mr. Whaley's affiants. It was undisputed that in every county hundreds of men were bought like sheep by the Whaley faction. Mr. Whaley said he did not buy them. Who did? They were bought for him. Was it with his knowledge and consent? How can we doubt it? If we would know positively, the facts can be determined by an investigation in South Carolina, where all witnesses can be reached. The names of 150 additional witnesses were given us to subpæna.

Mr. Speaker, last night Chairman Post said to the House that all parties charged with bribery had furnished affidavits. He is unfamiliar with the testimony I am sure. number of slimpsy, evasive affidavits were furnished by unimportant men, affidavits that dodge and avoid. Why do you not subpœna Peters, collector of the port, who collected thousands of dollars for Mr. Whaley? Why do you not subpœna R. C. Richardson, Mr. Whaley's cashier, who paid thousands of dollars out for Whaley, including $3,200 to Simmons in Whaley's own office? Also why not Alderman Simmons himself, who does not deny he spent $3,200 for Whaley votes? Why not subpoena Heape, Mr. Whaley's brother-in-law, who offered $500 to Barshay for Whaley headquarters? These men did not deny anything

Mr. POST. Did the gentleman say that he could get access to Simmons's affidavit? He denied everything he is accused of.
Mr. FREAR. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. Simmons did not deny this testimony. Find me such an affidavit, and I will read it

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. He is a member of the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. The gentleman asked the question why we did not subpœna Mr. Whaley's brother-in-law, Mr. Heape, as a witness. I know that the gentleman wants to be fair, and

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman wants to ask a question, I yield to him for a question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman know that Grace admitted before he concluded his testimony that the matter was altogether hearsay and that he could not tell us anything about it?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and this committee could not subpoena It did not have the power.

even a boy. It did not have the power.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. What was the use in subpænaing anybody?

Mr. FREAR. Heape was the man who went around and did this work. Why not subpœna Mr. Heape, Mr. Whaley's brother-in-law? I say, why not subpœna Heape, who testified he spent money generously in the blind tigers, and also other rich relatives of Mr. Whaley who contributed to his campaign. Why not Williams, who spent $2,900 in Berkeley County for Whaley, and Dan Bean and scores of others? Richardson, Peters, Bean, and many other men have not made affidavits; they will not perfure themselves. Why will you not subpona them? Why do you not get the facts? They are to be had, if you will investigate. Will we refuse to learn the truth, or will the House demand that the high standard of membership maintained for over a century is to be preserved?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; to my colleague from Wisconsin. Mr. NELSON. Why was not a subcommittee sent down there from the Committee on Elections to investigate the case?

Mr. FREAR. We had no power to subpœna. That is the answer.

Mr. NELSON. Where do you suggest that the committee should get the power?
Mr. FREAR. We are asking for that power now.

Many years ago, when : boy, I haunted the galleries above us listening to the intellectual giants of a former generation, men who then occupied this floor. Garfield, Reed, and McKinley on this side of the aisle; Randall, Carlisle, and Alexander Stephens on that. Men from the North and South whose names are indelibly written into the history of this country. Men who were inspired by strong convictions on public questions; whose power rested on exalted purpose, and whose characters were molded in the school of patriotism and duty. Champions of the people, they preserved the people's confidence by measuring up to their own high standards of citizenship. Darkness, crookedness, and corruption were by them ever subjected to the searchlight of truth.

Such men never would have consented to smother charges of political corruption when investigation was urged because of charges of a flagrant violation of Federal law by one of their own associates. They would have demanded an immediate investigation in justice to themselves, in justice to the accused Member, and for the honor of the House.

We are about to pass upon that same question. Will we close our eyes to evidences of gross violation of the law? Shall we demand from our own Members the same obedience to law which we require of those for whom we legislate?

Mr. Speaker, every man is answerable to his own conscience alone, but I do say that if the corrupt-practices act is to become a dead letter with us, if personal or political influences are to swerve our judgment as to when and where it is to be enforced, then we should repeal it. Let us have the courage to impartially enforce its provisions or else be frank with ourselves and wipe it off the statutes.

"WHITES CORRUPTED AS BAD AS NEGROES."

This is the all-important question here involved, and Mr. Whaley's connection is a mere incident which forces us, however, to squarely meet the issue. Before we vote to stifle this proposed investigation and place the seal of nullification upon a law passed for our own observance, permit me to briefly present the political conditions existing in the first South Carolina district at that primary. Fifty-five per cent of South Carolina's population is disfranchised because God made that proportion of his people down there darker than ourselves. Testimony shows that colored men are not allowed to vote in Mr. Whaley's district. The election returns show they do not vote anywhere within the State, yet Grace says-and he knows, and he swears that Whaley knows-that "you could not corrupt the negroes worse than the whites were corrupted at that election." I quote from the record. The testimony shows that the Hughes faction spent $44,500 and the Whaley faction approximately $60,000 at the primaries. They or their friends used $100,000 in corrupting the votes of the "whites"—not negroes, because only the whites had votes to sell.

Overwhelming evidence of vote buying is presented by seven witnesses, as I have stated, residents of the district, who came to Washington and testified to facts, not to hearsay. scores of men sell their votes, and they saw men buying these same votes for Hughes and Whaley. They saw the money paid. They gave names, places, and amounts. Frank Simmons received $1,900 in Mr. Whaley's office in the presence of three witnesses on the night before the primary to be used in the tenth ward of Charleston. Mayor Grace swore before the committee that he saw Simmons in the tenth ward the next day in a small room with $2,000 or more before him on the table, buying Whaley votes, like cattle. This testimony is uncontradicted. Sixty-four affidavits were also filed, many of them positive and unequivocal from men who handled money for Hughes or Whaley or were paid for their votes. Over a score of affidavits filed by Mr. Whaley in his own behalf contained admissions by the affiants of their use of money on primary day. Men whose names, so far as I can learn, do not appear in the report of expenditures filed by Mr. Whaley.

WHALEY FACTION USED $22,000 IN CHARLESTON ALONE.

Money, jobs, and whisky were the convincing arguments liberally used in every county in the district, in order to determine the relative qualifications for Congress of Mr. Whaley and Mr. Hughes. For illustration, a comparison of returns tells an unanswerable story in Charleston County. Thirty-eight precincts furnish 38 unimpeachable, corroborating witnesses to the corrupting power of $22,000 of Whaley money sworn to have been spent in that county, with names given of men who handled it. Money which increased Mr. Whaley's vote 86 per cent between the two primaries. Compare the primary votes printed in the minority report. Eighty per cent Compare the of the electorate in the ninth ward was debauched by $5,000 of Whaley money spent by O'Shaughnessy in that ward. Six affidavits and two witnesses in person testified as to this ward. Their testimony is practically uncontradicted. In ward 10 Simmons spent $3,200 and thereby doubled Whaley's vote. In ward 11 Healey doubled the vote for Whaley with $5,000, and in ward 12 Whaley money gained 300 per cent for its candidate in the second primary.

We POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Just for a question.

Mr. POST. I want to ask the gentleman if the question was not put to Mr. Grace—if Mr. Hughes had been elected, would he have brought the charges against Mr. Hughes?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; and he stated that he would not. I agree with the gentleman on that, but I think these charges ought to be investigated.

Mr. POST. I want to ask another question.

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield. When I get through I will be glad to answer them all, but you disarrange the thought that I have here, and I would like to carry it through. As a matter of courtesy, you were not interrupted yesterday. I was very careful to refuse to take your time, and I know you appreciate the situation.

Mr. POST. I yielded to all the questions that were asked me. I am trying to be courteous, but please let this Mr FREAR be the last question.

Mr. POST. You have not been courteous in saying what you have said as to the treatment of Mr. Grace.

Mr. FREAR. I do not mean the gentleman. I mean the action of the committee. I do not refer to the gentleman personally.

Mr. POST. If you decline to yield, all right. Mr. FREAR. No; I yield this one time. Will you give me more time?

Mr. POST. I can not yield any more time.

Mr. FREAR. I have had a dozen interruptions. There is a gentleman sitting beside you who believes in this corruptpractices act, and we want to carry it out.

Mr. RUCKER. I am sitting by the gentleman, and I have not said a word about it.

Mr. FREAR. I am talking to the chairman of the committee. Mr. POST. Does the gentleman believe the statement made by Mr. Grace upbraiding Simmons?

Mr. FREAR. Unquestionably.

Mr. POST. Did he not say that he upbraided Simmons, not for unlawfully buying votes but that he was working for

Mr. FREAR. Oh, that is simply argumentative, but it is true, as the gentleman has stated. There was no moral motive connected with it, but I am speaking of the depravity of spending the $3,200 that was put into that ward. Sixty-four affidavits were offered in support of this testimony, affidavits of men who gave the names of the men whom they bought, and told the amount of money they paid, that they bought votes for Whaley as well as votes for Hughes. This is the testimony that is uncontradicted.

Corruption is charged in every precinct and "at every crossroads," and names of 150 witnesses furnished, who, it is promised, if subpœnaed will make proof positive. Did Mr. Whaley know of these conditions? Did they exist with his knowledge and consent? That is the issue. He told the committee he visited every ward in the city on primary day.

His report of expenditures filed with the House, according to law, shows he spent $235 on primary day in bailing illegal voters out of jail-men who jumped their bail. The police records show the payments. The statement can not escape this expenditure, but how much, if anything, was paid the repeaters for becoming criminals? The statement is silent, yet he received the benefit of those illegal votes.

HUNDREDS OF WORKERS RECEIVED FROM $10 TO $50 APIECE.

Testimony of 2 witnesses shows from 60 to 70 paid ralliers or ward heelers worked for Mr. Whaley in each of two separate precincts of ward 9. Mr. Whaley told the committee that the witnesses meant 75 ralliers were from that entire ward. So be it. He should know. He was there. But how much were they paid? His report is silent. How much was paid for the hundreds of ralliers working for Mr. Whaley throughout the city at from $10 to $50 apiece? Working for the candidate who was visiting all the polls, according to his own testimony. Were these things with his knowledge and consent? Did he bail out the repeaters? He says he did. Did he see hundreds of ralliers working for him all over the city? He testifies to 75 in one ward. Did he see Simmons, who spent $3,200 in ward 10, money he received in Whaley's office? Did he see O'Shaughnessy spending $5,000 in ward 9? Did he see Healey spending thousands of dollars in ward 11? Did he visit ward 12, where money doubled his vote twice over? He stated he went through every ward in the city. Did he see these things? Is there a Member who is in doubt? If so, then ascertain the facts by an investigation.

Mr. Whaley filed a mass of evasive affidavits, a score or more containing the same phraseology, prepared by a Mr. Williams, who admitted in his own affidavit that he handled money in Berkeley County to help Mr. Whaley on primary day. Who furnished the money and how much for a man that now prepares a score of affidavits printed in the record? The guilelessness of a number of these affiants was somewhat discounted when their police-court records were filed with the committee.

One further fact is deeply significant. A member of this House is charged with the highest degree of moral turpitude, bribery, perjury, and other offenses, yet refuses to face his accusers at any of the hearings.

Mr. POST rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has answered that in his own way. I can not be interrupted at this point now. What think you of a Member of this House who, under these charges, refuses to ask for an investigation from his friends. his associates? And we are all his friends, so far as I know. What think you of a Member of this House who refuses to demand a vindication when, if these charges are false, those who proposed them have committed a criminal libel and ought to be punished? That is a proposition which seems one of the most significant things in this whole case. Let me say that he was not tried, he was not investigated. We had not the power to do anything, as I say, except sit around like a ladies' sewing circle, holding our hands and asking witnesses who chose to come before us, a few questions.

After all of these witnesses were examined, after all of the affidavits were filed, witnesses coming here at their own expense of hundreds of dollars, then the committee kicked into the street all of the witnesses, all of the testimony, and now seeks to laugh out of court this proceeding.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia. Mr. CRISP. I was waiting for the 15 minutes to elapse, as I did not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. At the conclusion of my remarks I will be very glad to be interrupted.

The report uses 25 pages, 18,000 words, equivalent to two whole pages of a metropolitan newspaper, to say that the committee does not desire to make an investigation. Think of it! A committee without power to investigate, without power to subpæna a witness, takes 18,000 words to say that it does not want the power. I say, with all good spirit toward the gentlemen on the committee, every one of whom I consider a personal friend, verily, the report doth protest too much.

STATE IN WHICH GOV. BLEASE PARDONED 985 CONVICTS.

Mr. Speaker, the question has come: How can we, with clean hands, point the finger of scorn at South Carolina and ask why they do not prosecute when we have full knowledge of all these facts? Mr. Speaker, it was said here last night that Mr. Grace admitted he could not prosecute successfully in South Carolina; that to indict one person would be to indict the whole community, and that doubtless is the effect. We have startling evidence of that fact when 985 convicts have been pardoned in South Carolina, an evidence of the contempt for law and order, the contempt for courts of justice, and may we not well believe that the people of South Carolina, the good people-and there are thousands of them there—the law-abiding and God-fearing people, would welcome an investigation that pointed the way to better political conditions, to a better public conscience.

Mr. Speaker, one hundred years ago to the day there sat in this body the greatest statesman that South Carolina ever produced, second to none in his day and second to none in ours. With marvelous foresight that profound student of governmental problems saw dangers that were confronting this young Republic of ours in the years to come, and he made use of a prophecy, a warning, which comes to us to-day with deep significance, when he said:

When it shall come to be understood that politics is a game; that those who engage in it but play a part; that they assume this or that position not from honest conviction but from a desire to delude the people, then that people will lose all confidence in public men. All will be deemed mere jugglers, the honest and the patriotic as well as the cunning and the corrupt.

[Applause.]

The mutability of human affairs is illustrated to-day when we behold the unparalleled record of executive jail breaking occurring in the home State of the incorruptible, the mighty Calhoun, and if he could look down here to-day upon us, upon this body that once he so signally honored, he would see knocking at our doors the chief executive of his home city, asking us to help purge that State from the trafficking in votes and other forms of political vice. If he could speak, Calhoun's voice Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR (continuing). That once made the Nation tremble, would disown this effort to cover up corruption, and he would demand in thunderous tones, for the fair name of his party, for the fair name of the House, for the honor of his State and country, that the truth be known. [Applause.]

Mr. ELDER. Does not the gentleman think that if the mayor had used his power to prosecute some of these men who were doing crooked work in the elections that he would come nearer purifying elections than by coming here with a lot of witnesses and charges that-

Mr. FREAR. If the gentleman from Louisiana will ask that question afterwards, I will be glad to answer it, because there is something else I desire to present at this moment.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit me to ask one ques-

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman commended the mayor for trying to purify the elections of South Carolina at Charleston. Did not the mayor, whom the gentleman commended, admit he spent $15,000 himself to be elected mayor, when the salary of the office of mayor for four years only amounted to $14,000?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; he did; but do two wrongs make one right? [Applause.] And he also went before the Legislature of South Carolina and tried to get passed an Australian ballot, and he says it is evident there that no poor man—

Mr. CRISP. What evidence was there of that fact?
Mr. FREAR. What fact?
Mr. CRISP. That Mr. Grace attempted to get the Australian

Mr. FREAR. Simply the evidence stated repeatedly in the record without a particle of evidence to the contrary.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. FREAR. Just one.

The gentleman, in his speech some time ago, Mr. CRISP. commended Mr. Grace by saying it was the duty of all good citizens if corruption existed in elections to come to Congress and try to have it purified. The gentleman commended Mr. Grace for coming here with witnesses by saying it was the duty of good citizens to try to have elections purified.

Mr. FREAR. Well, I do not know whether I did or not, but I certainly do. It is the duty of any man to come to the door of salvation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to probe charges of corruption. We can not dismiss them when we have here over four score of witnesses as to this corruption. You can not wipe it

If we ignore these charges, if we vote to nullify this law, we simply say to the country that a law passed by Congress for its own government—to control its own Members, for clean and honest elections, is a farce and a nullity—a law which is admitted to be a weak law, but which if enforced will help to minimize the shameful conditions existing down in South Carolina; a law which does say to the people that while Congress legislates for others it will not ignore the plain demands of truth and of justice and of moral responsibility when the integrity of its own membership is challenged. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left of the hour? The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Sisson in the chair). Four minutes

Mr. FREAR. I will devote the four minutes now to ques-

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia. Mr. HOWARD. I have listened with much interest to your statement.

Mr. FREAR. I thank you very much. Mr. HOWARD. And I am trying to conjure in my own mind upon what theory you proceed, whether it takes a thief to catch

Mr. FREAR. Sometimes.

Mr. HOWARD (continuing). Or whether a man should do equity before he comes and asks equity.

Mr. FREAR. Not to this House; no. Mr. HOWARD. So you think that-

Mr. FREAR. Just ask the question. I can not submit to an argument. I have only four minutes. I will answer it right here and state my position, and you can state yours in your own time. Mr. Grace comes to us admitting that money has been used down there, but he came squarely to us and said, "I place my cards on the table." We are no more concerned in doing equity with Mayor Grace than we are with anyone else. It is a question with this House of whether it will do justice between itself and one of its own Members.

Mr. HOWARD. But the credibility of witnesses is recognized.

Mr. FREAR. We have 64 witnesses here and 24 affidavits that are corroborative, furnished by Mr. Whaley.

Mr. HOWARD. Then, taking you at your own word you would believe a horse thief on the stand just as quick as you would any citizen of the community?

Mr. FREAR. You do not believe that.

Mr. HOWARD. That is what everybody supposes on this side of the House

Mr. FREAR. They are certainly too intelligent for that.
Mr. HOWARD. You ask us to believe Grace and his disreputable witnesses against a man who has refuted every single, solitary statement.

Mr. FREAR. He does not. I have pointed out things that he has not touched on, that are not disputed here, and ought to be investigated. We ask for an investigation and to get the facts.

Mr. HOWARD. Do you not believe it would be as hard to get the truth out of the number of witnesses that Grace has as it would be to climb a greased pole backward with an armful of eels? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he admits they have taken to electing horse thieves as mayors in the great cities of the South?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I received this telegram last night after the speech by Mr. Post, the chairman, was made on the floor. The telegram is from Mayor Grace.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has only one minute remaining.

Mr. FREAR. I will read:

CHARLESTON, S. C., January 26, 1914.

Hon. J. A. Frear,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The city budget and some other large municipal questions make my official duties here at this particular time very absorbing. Our legislature is also at the height of its session, which will last only a month longer, and many big questions affecting Charleston are before it. I must be present either in Charleston or Columbia alternately for at least a few weeks yet, otherwise I would surely be in Washington, where I could perhaps be of some help to you in the Whaley matter, in which as you know I am so profoundly interested. Opinion here, while, of course, divided, is nevertheless strongly growing in favor of an investigation. The day after the decision was announced the News and Courier published an editorial which was a confession of our deplorable conditions, its view, of course, being that the matter was over up there and that it could talk freely. The other Charleston daily paper some time later published an editorial about it along the same lines, so that I can truthfully say that not only those whom I represent in this matter urgently demand the investigation, but those who have represented Mr. Whaley practically confess that I have told nothing but the truth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has

Mr. FREAR. I will take additional time for the completion of the reading of this telegram.

I have been too busy to send you the analysis of Mr. Posr's report, so replete with errors, so misleading, and so utterly unjust and unjustified. Although I can not be in Washington now my heart and my hopes and those of the majority of this community are with you in your fight on the floor of the House. I wish to renew the proposition made to Mr. Post that if I can get only the power of subpœna I will be able to produce witnesses who are Mr. Whaley's closest friends, but who will not perjure themselves and who when they tell the truth will prove my case. This I will do at my expense. Mr. Post's statement in his report to the effect that I have had more than the power of subpœna, because I was allowed to produce affidavits is enough to prove how specious the whole report is. I have produced affidavits every one of which is true and which will be amply borne out by witnesses under subpœna. My hands and lips are clean in this whole matter. Every one of these affidavits was procured freely and fairly. Many others I could have had had I permitted myself to take the slightest risk of imputation. I have refused to take affidavits in any case where I thought it might be seld that the affinat expected reward of any kind. In asking for the adoption of the minerity report you stand upon solid ground and need fear nothing in the shape of failure on my part. You will be reenforced by truth upon truth in such degree that no honest man can doubt, and I sincerely trust that the House will order an investigation.

(Signed) JOHN P. Grace. (Signed) JOHN P. GRACE.

Say what you will, if that is not the tone of a man telling the truth, as I believe sincerely Mr. Grace is-although I do not countenance all the things that he has done; but we are like many a lawyer who has witnesses on the stand and who is obliged to convict a defendant by the use of the best evidence in order to get conviction. But I am not obliged to do that here, because I believe Mr. Grace has told the truth. He is with a condition of corruption there that is indulged in by all parties.

If I had the time, I would quote from this same record, which admits the condition down there and admits that we ought to investigate and abolish the condition that exists; but

I will not take up more time. [Applause.]

How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. FREAR. I reserve the balance of my time and here insert the election records and corrupt-practices compilations.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, after the gentleman finishes, if there is any question that anyone desires to ask me I will be glad to answer. This interruption is not to be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not any questions to propound to my friend at this particular moment.

Mr. Speaker, after about 18 years' activity at the bar in the prosecution and the defense of criminal cases, I have about arrived at the conclusion that I would not be willing to even suspicion a suck-egg dog on the testimony presented by my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear]. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], I think, made one of the ablest arguments on this particular case that I have heard in this House since I have been a Member of it. He seemed to be thoroughly conversant with all of the testimony adduced at this hearing, and if one-fifth of what the gentleman from Idaho said is true about the accusers of Mr. Whaley, I think it is a matter that this House should not have taken as long as five minutes with. [Applause.]

But in the brief time that has been allotted to me by the chairman of the committee I want to call the attention of the House to the hands-to the kind of hands-that Grace brings into this House and asks Representatives of the American people to believe him and his witnesses. In the first place, he acknowledges before the committee that he is an absolute grafter of the very worst character, in that as the head of a city government in a civilized community, where the laws are supposed to be enforced, he quarterly taxed, to put into the coffers of the city of Charleston, and, incidentally, into the pockets of his henchmen, $50 each every three months from people whom he knew were engaged in the violation of the law which he had sworn he would administer within the confines of the city of Charleston.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. HOWARD. If the gentleman will give me more time I will yield to him.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman can take it out of my time. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. FREAR. There are records that show that $32,000 was collected and that every dollar went into the city treasury. of this money goes into the city treasury. He has furnished a statement of it to the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; and in the language of the gentleman from Wisconsin, two wrongs do not make a right. When he took that money and put it into the coffers of the city of Charleston, and when he permitted the violation of a law that he had taken an oath to solemnly administer, I would not be-lieve him on his oath if he took that oath on a stack of Bibles as high as the dome of this Capitol and three times the size of

it. [Laughter and applause.]

What does the laying of hands on the holy evangelists of Almighty God mean to a man of that character? his drunkards and scalawags, as they are described by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. French], he and his dirty bootleggers, as also described by the gentleman from Idaho, have come to the very threshold of the American Government and vomited all over it in the persons of Grace and his henchmen and sought to cast reflections on an honorable citizen of a great district, and then has asked if we believe these dirty little ward politicians.

I will tell you what is the matter with Grace. He has got as much venom in him as a rattlesnake, and he and his fellow corruptionists exacted $34,000 from his henchmen and spent it in an effort to defeat a gentleman for Congress, and because he has lost his game he is crying like a baby. That is the condition that Grace is in. And yet the gentleman who is chairman of this committee [Mr. Post] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. French] who rose above partisanship and stated that he had carefully investigated every bit of the evidence here, and demonstrated it by the continuity of his thought when he pre-sented his argument to this House, did not go through any gymnastic stunts as did the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Freak], but made an able and straightforward presentation of the facts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague upon the committee [Mr. Elder].

Mr. ELDER, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this should in any manner be turned into a party question. Each member of the committee has acted as he thought best after hearing the evidence. The Progressive member and one of the Republican members, after hearing the witnesses, sided with the majority of the committee.

A charge of guilt does not mean that a man is guilty. We sit here at this time only in the position of grand jurors, and a witness appears here, and by the flimsiest kind of flimsy testimony attempts to use his position as mayor of a large city in mony attempts to use his position as mayor of a large city this country, which position he admitted he obtained by fraud and corruption, and tells us that on account of his position we should be mirch and be smear a man's character. The gentleshould be mirch and be smear a man's character. The gentle-man from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear] says, as does Mayor Grace, that Mr. Grace wants to purify conditions in South Carolina. Those conditions may need it. I do not know; but the proper way for Mr. Grace, with all the power he has as lord of that city, is to bring charges against the men who he says sell Why does he not do it? Because he does not want to purify conditions, and his charges are merely the howl of a whipped dog, a mere attempt on his part to use this Congress as a means to besmirch the character of one of its Members and to do something that the voters of the first congressional district of South Carolina refused to do. If you had been in that committee room and had seen the methods of Mayor Grace before the committee I am sure that the most of you at least would have almostly instantly decided the character of the man and the character of his charges. He attempted to assume charge He brought his of the whole proceedings of the committee. hired henchmen there. Every man he brought there except Larisey was on his pay roll. They were men who held their jobs under him, and when questions were asked of them he would inform a witness who was under oath as to whether he could answer the question or not. I was the first one who remonstrated with him. I wish to say that the chairman of the committee gave him a great deal more consideration than I would have given him. If I had had the power, either in a court or a committee, and a man had acted as he did, I would have failed him. He attempted to run the committee from the beginning and to tell men, "Yes; you may tell that," or by shaking his head to tell them "No; you can not tell that." Did he want the whole truth? No; he only wanted such things as might satisfy his own despicable ends.

Now, there were admittedly two river-front wards in the city of Charleston, two bad wards in which money had been used to greater or less degree. They admit that Mr. Hughes spent $44,500, a considerable portion of it in these two wards. say that Mr. Whaley, on the other hand, spent $60,000, or even a larger amount in those two wards. Now, let us see if the a larger amount in those two wards. Now, let us see if the statement bears it out. Mr. Whaley got 141 votes in the three wards and Mr. Hughes 579. They say that every vote except 100 in that ward is purchasable. That is the testimony of their own witnesses. Then, even taking their own statement, it does not look as though Mr. Whaley got very many of those purchasable votes, and if they were bought it looks as though that $44,500 bought them.

That was the record of the second primary. In the first primary Mr. Whaley got 133 and Mr. Hughes 458.

The ninth ward, the other purchasable ward, ran in the same way. They say those were the purchasable wards of the city. Yet the result shows that Mr. Whaley got a very small vote in the two purchasable wards.

I dare say that every man on the floor of this House has in his district some enemy more or less powerful who, if he thought he could besmirch a Member's character and drag him down, would perjure himself and have his henchmen do likewise by appearing before a committee of this House and making charges against the Member. I know I have one or two men of that sort in my district. I feel that perhaps the rest of you

Now, bring this home to yourselves: If your deadliest enemy, a man who admits that he hates you, who admits that he has used bribery and corruption for years in his own campaigns, should come here and make a charge against you, unsupported by any testimony except that of his hired henchmen, men in his employment, would you think, as a matter of fairness, that this House should send it out over the country that after a preliminary examination they believed that there was a basis for those charges and that you ought to be investigated?

If I believed that Mr. Whaley had used an unfair dollar in this campaign, I certainly would vote to investigate it.

Before I had seen Mr. Grace, when I had merely heard of him as mayor of a large city, I supposed he was a man of high character, and I went into that committee room thinking that there ought to be an investigation, that something should be done about the matter. I did not go through more than the first hearing until I made up my mind that the mayor of Charleston, S. C., was an admitted crook, and that there was no strength or basis for his charges

I would be besmirching my own conscience if, by a threat that some people in my district could say that I ought to investigate it, to save myself a few votes I should inflict an undeserved stigma on one of my colleagues in this House,

As to the statement about the negro votes of Mayor Grace, I think it comes with bad grace from a man in the South who knows the Caucasian blood and who has watched and been familiar with the negroes in that country to say that there is a larger percentage of purchasable votes among the whites than there is among the negroes. I brand the man that makes such a charge as that as a deliberate falsifier of the truth. I do not believe that white men, generally speaking, are of that stripe. [Applause.]
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the first work I ever performed in a committee room in my life was as a member of the committee on privileges and elections of the House of Representatives in South Carolina. I remember we tried two important cases bitterly contested. I remember then what was done, and I propose on this occasion to do what I did then-voice and vote my honest convictions. In one case mentioned I voted to seat the contestee; in the other I voted against seating the contestee.

As I understand this proceeding, it is by way of an inquiry submitted to an election committee of the House. They investigate the facts, they come here and make a report stating whether or not the allegations which called for the investiga-tion demand that a resolution be introduced into this House declaring that my colleague Mr. Whaley is no longer entitled to a seat in this House because of his acts and doings. Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? I will give him more of my time. That is not the purport of the resolution. It simply asks for an investigation.

Mr. FINLEY. I understand that; but what I state is the What you ask for makes no difference here. Now, what are the facts? I have listened to the arguments advanced as to why there should be a further investigation, why a special committee should be sent to Charleston, and I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Illinois that if you can not get up a statement of facts by way of an that if you can not get up a statement or facts by way of an aflidavit, you can not to save your life bring witnesses by subpoena or otherwise, where they will be subject to cross-examination, and obtain those facts. I want to say right now that the same enemies, the same following, and the same spite in its foundation and in its origin pursued the late George S. Legare during the later years of his service here. These same people instigated trouble when he was not physically able to make a campaign, they put up Larisey against him, and forced him into a bitter and vindictive campaign.

I ask anybody who has read the testimony in this hearing, Where is there any evidence upon which to base a further or proper investigation? The report of the majority of the committee says there is none. I have read that record, I have read the reports, I have read what is printed, and there is no evidence that will warrant any further investigation. ing is taken from the report:

Notwithstanding the fact that the whole of the testimony submitted by Mr. Grace in support of his charges were mere rumors, Mr. Whaley, the majority of the committee believe, most successfully refuted such rumors. An examination of the testimony produced shows that there is very little, if any, of the testimony which should be received in any court of justice in this or any other civilized country. In so far as it relates to the question of bribery or illegal voting, it does not rise even to the dignity of hearsay.

It is a matter based upon hearsay and rumor from start to finish. I ask the membership of this House for what? Suppose John T. Grace is the mayor of Charleston, what of that? It is the first time, and in all likelihood it will be the last time. I think the people of Charleston, even his own crowd, will have enough of him when they read his statement giving it as his opinion that you could not corrupt the negroes any worse than the white people were corrupted in the last election.

Something has been said about South Carolina and how the law is administered and how the pardoning power is dealt with. That has nothing to do with this case. It is brought in here to try to influence somebody to vote otherwise than they would vote. Now, I hold no brief for the governor of South Carolina or anyone else, but when a Member of this House rises in his seat without justification or excuse except for partisan purposes in debate and lays the weight of his little finger on the State of South Carolina, which I have the honor in part to represent, or in any way attacks her government or her chosen officials I say to him that I will answer him. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. POST. I yield to the gentleman one minute longer.
Mr. FINLEY. I will say that every transfer from the penitentiary to the roads of the State, and each commutation of sentence, and parole during good behavior is set down as a pardon, and all of these are included in the large number of pardons. I have no doubt that the governor has pardoned many people that I or some of you would not pardon, but that has nothing to do with this case. There is no proof here upon which the House can base a resolution for an investigation, or lodge any charge of wrongdoing against Mr. Whaley or his friends. He was honestly nominated, so far as the record shows, and I know that he was honestly elected, and he ought not to be persecuted further.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin use the remainder of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I am now willing to be interrupted at any time. I do not know that I can add anything to what has already been said, but I do not wish gentlemen to hesitate if they desire to present any question, because I agreed that I would answer any gentleman, and I try to make good my promises. The suggestion was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard] a while ago that he would not base any kind of an investigation upon a man who was a confessed briber. and yet, Mr. Speaker, the time of this House has been occupied for months with witnesses who have been investigating certain things on the testimony of one Mulhall, whose character was not above reproach.

As to Gov. Blease, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] says he was interpolated into this case for the purpose of prejudice. That was not the intention at all. It was to show the contempt for law and order in South Carolina, a contempt for the courts of justice that would cause him, contrary to law and legal prosecutions, to throw 985 men out of State prison. Mr. Grace shows that the same condition exists in Charleston. where, as he said, to indict one man means to indict the whole community.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly: I yield to the gentleman from Geor-

What is the purpose of the gentleman's Mr. BARTLETT. resolution; to investigate this in order to oust the sitting Member, Mr. Whaley, as not being entitled to his seat, or to expel him in case the proof would justify such a thing? Mr. FREAR. The petition was for the purpose of ousting, and this resolution is for the purpose of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. BARTLETT. To what end—to oust? Mr. FREAR. So that thi: House may know whether it wishes expel him.

Mr. BARTLETT. Expel?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; or reprimand him, or take any course it

Mr. BARTLETT. Would the House have authority on any sort of return to prevent him from holding his seat, except by expulsion?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, frequently so-well, I do not know what the practice of the House is, but I was thinking of other legislative bodies. Frequently they reprimand publicly. They take whatever action they see fit to take in the premises

Mr. BARTLETT. One more question, and I thank the gentleman for answering me.

Mr. FREAR. I do not know what the precedents here are,

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not within the power of the House now, if these charges are true, both under the State law and under the corrupt-practices act, if the sitting Member, Mr. Whaley, has failed to make a return of the money he expended in accordance with that act, to proceed to take such steps as would place him under indictment, under the law, if the law is constitutional-and I do not think it is worth the paper it is written on?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I will say that the gentleman and I pretty nearly agree about the law, and that is what we want to find out-whether this act is constitutional or of any value whatsoever

Mr. ELDER. Does the gentleman think that we ought to make a contest on Mr. Whaley until some prima facie showing has been made?

Mr. FREAR. I answer the gentleman from Louisiana, that the showing is very strong. I have related all of the facts in the case. I examined almost every witness at the request of the It was not a voluntary proceeding on my part.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. POST. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact, in view of the statements made on the floor of the House as to the treatment that I had accorded this man Grace, that the gentleman practically conducted the entire examination?

Mr. FREAR. That is true.

Mr. POST. And conducted the proceedings?

Yes; at the request of the chairman, I will say. Mr. POST. And if the record does not disclose that at the close of the last statement of Mr. Grace he thanked the committee and said that he had been treated with the utmost

Mr. FREAR. I do not remember the statement. Mr. POST. And does not the record show that? Mr. FREAR. Possibly so.

I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. FREAR. Of course, I do not want this to be taken out

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course, it is taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. FREAR. Then I object to any further questions, because this is in the nature of an argument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further. Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Whaley, as I understand, admits he paid some $235 as bail bond of parties who failed to appear in the police court.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With what offense were they charged,

Mr. FREAR. With repeating and illegal voting, and they jumped their bail.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Whaley then paid this as a part of his election and campaign expense to immunize these parties from the penitentiary?

Mr. FREAR. So it shows in the record. Yes.

The committee report says, in connection with Sargeant, that the conditions testified to by him could not possibly be believed. There has been the same condition presented recently in Ohio, Chairman Post's own State, in Adams County, as I have said, and in other States, and there is no reflection upon the people of the State because a particular community indulges in that kind of corruption. We all deplore this, and I am appealing to you that we investigate and put a stop to such corruption. you sit here helpless, or will you go down and get the facts. Can any man in this House answer what the facts are? If Mr. Whaley wants a vindication, let us then give it to him: but do not give a whitewash with muddy water and with a brush which consists of only a stick, and a poor stick at that—this committee—which admits it has no power.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand it, the only reason why they will not investigate is the possibility that it will injure Mr. Whaley. Is that it?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. That is the reason given.
Mr. NELSON. On the other hand, if it is investigated, will not the investigation clearly disclose the facts, and, if not true, it will not leave any smirch upon his character that these charges now leave upon it?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Wisconsin, my colleague, has, in a few simple words, stated it clearly, and I welcome his putting it in that form. If we have this investigation, Mr. Whaley's innocence will be shown, providing he is not guilty.

Mr. COPLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COPLEY. One of the speakers on the other side made the statement that he would not accept the testimony under oath of the mayor of Charleston, for the reason that the excise law had been violated under his administration. I would like to ask you if the same line of reasoning would not exclude the credibility of the mayors of New York City for the last 10 years. because they had sworn to enforce the law in New York City, and, as a matter of open knowledge, until the last year or so, the excise law was violated there constantly, weekday and Sunday?

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman. The argument is unanswerable. And any gentleman here who has prosecuted criminals knows, and you have seen it in your experience, that often you have had to depend on men who turned State's evidence. Some of the most important criminal cases ever tried have rested on the testimony of such men. And here is a man, the mayor of the city of Charleston, a city with 6,000 votes, and he must be a man of responsibility.

This is all I have time to present to the House in regard to this matter from the standpoint of the minority. endeavored to show by testimony that is fair and reasonable that a condition exists down in South Carolina which does not entitle the gentleman now representing that district to sit in this House until he vindicates himself from the charges. proposed by the committee to give him a whitewashing, which is unjustified by the facts and unfair to the Member himself. The honor of this House becomes involved when a Member is charged with the offenses that have been lodged against Mr. Whaley, and the House should know the truth.

Mr. ELDER. Is it not a fact that the mayor admitted before the committee that he knew this man "Rattles" was running a notorious dive, and that he could have closed him up at any time he pleased?

Mr. FREAR. Yes, sir. We do not differ on anything of that kind, and I do not think we ought to do so.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Do I understand that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Elder] is a member of the committee?

Mr. ELDER. That is true. Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Would it not seem to you, in view of what was said by some of the men on that committee, that Mr. Grace was a subject for investigation instead of Mr.

Whaley?

Mr. ELDER. It was in the minds of some that we should have Mr. Grace instead of Mr. Whaley; that something ought to have been done to him.

Mr. FREAR. That is all I think need be presented to the House in regard to this matter from the standpoint of the minority. We have, as I said, endeavored to show here by testimony that has been fair and reasonable that a condition of things exists down in South Carolina that does not entitle the gentleman who now represents that district to sit in this House until he vindicates himself from the charge. It is proposed here to give him a cheap whitewashing, which is unjustified by the facts and unfair to the Member himself. I do not think the gentlemen of past generations of whom I have spoken, among them Calhoun, from the State of South Carolina, a State which is interested in this proceeding, would have thought for a mo-ment of doing this. Their idea of their own personal honor was higher. The honor of this House also becomes involved when a Member is charged with all the offenses that have been lodged against Mr. Whaley.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Stephens].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Stephens] is recognized for 29 minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in January, 1913, Hon. George S. Legare, who represented the first district of South Carolina in this body, died. For the purpose of electing his successor an election was ordered to be held on April 29, 1913. The Democratic Party held a primary on April 1 to nominate its candidate, whose name should appear on the ticket at the general election as the nominee of the party.

There were five candidates for the nomination. None of them received a majority. So, under the law of the State a second primary was held on April 15, and the two candidates who had received the highest number of votes in the first primary were voted for. These two gentlemen were E. W. Hughes and Richard S. Whaley. At the second primary Mr. Whaley received a majority of the votes cast. He was declared the nominee of the party, and was subsequently elected to Congress without opposition

No contest has been filed nor any charges preferred against Mr. Whaley by either of his four opponents. So far as the record shows, each of them has accepted the results of the political contest without murmur or complaint.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I will, Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Is it not a fact that some of the testimony adduced before the com littee was to the effect that some of those opponents were guilty of the same things that were charged against Mr. Whaley?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. That is very true.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. They naturally would not object, then

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. This was not true as to all of them, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois.

On September 20, nearly five months after the election, one John P. Grace filed with the Speaker of the House certain charges against Mr. Whaley. The matter was referred to Elec-tion Committee No. 1. After long and careful consideration of the matter, the committee, by a vote of 7 to 2, authorized Hon. J. D. Post, chairman, to offer in the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the charges filed by John P. Grace against Richard S. Whaley, Representative from the first congressional district of the State of South Carolina to the Sixty-third Congress, be dismissed.

THE CHARGES AGAINST WHALEY.

The charges against Mr. Whaley are of an exceedingly serious nature. It is alleged that he announced his candidacy and began his canvass, "simultaneously circulating throughout the district that whoever entered the race must be prepared to out-spend him in money."

Again, it is alleged that he "spent in the first and second primaries, and the campaign incident thereto, not less than $60,000." It is alleged also that he "willfully and broadless than It is alleged also that he "willfully and knowingly filed false sworn statements with the Clerk of the House of Representatives," as to the amount of his campaign expenses, and that he "committed four separate and deliberate and felonious perjuries"; that he "openly bought his nomination and election by going out upon the highways and byways and debauching the electorate, and by using over twelve times as much as the maximum of money allowed by law"; that he made preelection promises contrary to the law, and perjured himself in this regard.

If the charges can be proven, Mr. Whaley should not be allowed to retain his seat in Congress, and I would unhestitatingly vote to expel him. But I am not convinced that they are true. Indeed I have been unable to find anything in the record that is at all worthy of belief that tends, even in the remotest degree, to sustain the charges.

Mr. Grace and several other witnesses appeared before the committee, and a large number of affidavits were presented.

This testimony was almost entirely in the nature of hearsay. In it all there was scarcely any reference to Mr. Whaley himself, and there was only the slightest effort to connect him or any relative of his with any misconduct, and this came from a source that was thoroughly discredited. Even if everything that was testified to in regard to any personal act of his were true, it would not justify any action of the House against him. I refer, of course, to statements based on personal knowledge, and not those based on hearsay.

The record, which is very voluminous, is filled up almost entirely with statements of hearsay, speculation, opinion, and extraneous matter.

John P. Grace is the sole proponent of these charges against Whaley. He was not a candidate for Congress; but he says that the issue in the campaign was "Grace or anti-Grace." As he was the issue in the campaign, and as he has been exceedingly active in presenting this matter, it is important that we should know something of him.

Let us analyze the character and motives of Mr. Grace. In this analysis some of the language may seem harsh, but it will may the good Lord protect and defend his enemies!

be no harsher than the truth. I would not do him an injustice. He shall have no improper or unjust criticism passed upon him by me. Everything said about him will be entirely war-ranted by the record and, in most instances, by his own statements, from which I shall quote.

WHO IS JOHN P. GRACE?

According to his own statement, he is mayor of the city of Charleston, by right of purchase. He admitted that he expended $15,000 in electing himself to this office.

According to his own statement he is a corruptionist in poli-After describing the political corruption that he claimed existed in his home city-buying and selling votes, and political debauchery generally-he stated that "I followed the game." When he first came before the committee he was requested to make affidavit or to be sworn to his statement as to certain illegitimate expenditures of money in the interest of Whaley, about which he claimed to have personal knowledge. He re-fused to do so, and said, "I am not in position to cast the first stone," explaining that he had used money to procure his own election.

Without any regard for law. good morals, or his oath of office, he has permitted the law to be openly and flagrantly violated. Again, I call attention to his own language. He produced a witness by the name of Hogan. While Hogan was testifying, Mr. Grace interrupted and explained why Hogan lined up with him in his fight against Whaley in the election. He said:

When I was elected mayor I was in a position to drive him to the wall absolutely, because he was in a business which would have enabled me, if I had shown the disposition to do so, to absolutely drive him to the wall.

Mr. ELDER. That is the liquor business?
Mr. GRACE. Yes, sir; to be perfectly frank with you, the liquor busi-

Mr. Frear. What do you mean by driving him to the wall?

Mr. Frear. What do you mean by driving him to the wall?

Mr. Grace. I mean to say that if I had cared to exercise the vigilance of the police force against him—he was in a business that, according to the strict interpretation of the law, he should not have been in.

Mr. Frear. In what way?

Mr. Grace. In the liquor business.

Mr. Frear. In what way?

Mr. Grace. Well, it was a blind tiger?

Mr. Frear. He was running a blind tiger?

Mr. Grace. Yes, sir.

Mr. Frear. How many blind tigers are now in Charleston?

Mr. Grace. Probably 250. * * * They do not have the right to exist at all, and I could have fined him and in that way driven him to the wall. This man realized that I had done something for him.

He made this statement freely and voluntarily. No one had mentioned blind tigers until Mr. Grace brought up the subject himself, and his whole idea seemed to be to explain why Hogan lined up with him. He evidenced no sense of shame as to his conduct in this matter. He seemed to entirely justify it on the grounds that it was a custom, and that he treated all the blind tigers alike. His whole appearance and his statements as to his dealing with these violators of the law indicated that he was either morally color-blind or morally atrophied.

Another trait in Mr. Grace's character is shown by his statement in regard to Mr. E. W. Hughes, Mr. Whaley's opponent. Grace supported Hughes and was his campaign manager. He testified that Mr. Hughes spent in that campaign $44,500, and that much of it was used in the purchase of votes.

This statement shows that he does not hesitate to defame and bring into disrepute a friend. The good name or reputation of a friend is but trash to him. He was under no compulsion to make this statement. It was entirely voluntary on his part. No member of the committee, or anyone else, had asked him anything about it. If Hughes did expend a large sum of money illegally, it had no connection with the charges against Whaley. It added nothing to the strength of his case. If true, it was a voluntary betrayal of the confidence of a friend and a betrayal of facts, the knowledge of which was obtained by reason of the friendly relations that had previously existed between him and Hughes to such an extent that he was Mr. Hughes's campaign manager.

His statement about Mr. Hughes is either true or false. true, it shows a wicked spirit in the man, because, as already stated, Grace volunteered the information. The committee had not asked for it. It was not interested in that matter, because it was not connected with the case under investigation. Mr. Grace is a lawyer, and he thoroughly understood that it was both unnecessary and improper to bring Hughes's name into the case. In my judgment, whether the statement as to Mr. Hughes is true or false, in view of the circumstances surrounding the matter, it writes Mr. Grace down as a man upon whom one can not safely rely. If a man is willing to defame, besmirch, and bring into disrepute his friend, when there is absolutely no reason for him referring to his friend, what would such a man not do to an enemy? If he deals thus with a friend,

That he is willing to defame the citizens of his own citywilling to stigmatize them in such a manner as to hold them up as fit subjects for scorn and contempt-is shown by another voluntary statement. At the time it was made he was not even being questioned. A witness was being interrogated, and Mr. Grace interrupted him and used this language:

Without any reflection on the white people in the town I live in, I do not believe that you could corrupt the negroes any worse than the white people were corrupted in the last election.

"Without any reflection on the white citizens." Great heavens! If he were to attempt to reflect on the white people of Charleston, what worse could he say? To say that the people of the city of Charleston have become politically more debased, more immoral, and more corrupt than negroes is but to reach the acme of reflection.

It is a notorious fact that the vote of the negroes is a subject of barter and sale. Therefore, to make this charge against the people means simply this: That they have descended to the lowest depths of moral and political degradation and have become totally unfit to enjoy the right of the ballot. I do not believe that the statement is true, and I have no respect for any man who will make such a charge against his own people. Especially will I refuse to believe it when the statement comes from a self-confessed political corruptionist and from one who makes political capital to his own profit by conniving with dive keepers and habitual violators of the law.

Some of his fellow citizens do not believe that he is very "valiant for the truth." H. C. Millican, a citizen of Charleston, states that he-believes that Mayor Grace would tell Hogan, or anybody else, to answer to anything, whether true or false, if he thought it necessary to carry his point.

J. J. O'Shaughnessy, who is serving his sixth term of two years each as ministerial magistrate of Charleston, states

Mayor Grace is vindictive and revengeful, and anyone who opposes him subjects himself to his ill will, and he will not hesitate to do anything to the injury of such a one.

Again, Mr. O'Shaughnessy says that-Mayor Grace would not hesitate to force these witnesses, and all of them, to testify to anything necessary for said purpose or to steal deponent's character.

Frank M. Cox states that one of Mr. Grace's witnesses has been placed on the police force since the election, and-

It is deponent's opinion that his job on the police force is the pay for the lie he has told.

INTEREST AND MOTIVE OF MR. GRACE.

What prompted Mr. Grace to file charges against Mr. Whaley? Was it because he is conscientiously opposed to such methods in politics? Evidently not, as he says that he "plays the game" himself. Then he told the committee that if his friend Mr. Hughes had won he would not have opened his mouth, although he says that Hughes spent $44,500. This last statement makes it clear that he was not inspired to this action by purely patriotic motives. His moral sense is not shocked when money is used illegally, either for himself or his friend.

Then, what sprung him to action in this matter? It was the feeling of malice and ill will that he bears toward Whaley. He is so full of malice toward Whaley that if one more ounce of it were injected into his system his very hide would burst under the strain. There has been both personal and political antagonism between them for years.

Mr. Grace states that he said to some of his friends, "Don't you know that this is a fight on me?" He took Whaley's election as a personal affront and defeat, and he is now exerting every effort in his power to revenge himself by annoying Whaley. My opinion is that he told the story of his own political misdeeds, besmirched and beslimed his friend Hughes, cast a stigma upon the fair name of his State and the citizens of his own home city for one single purpose. He had preferred charges of a very serious nature against Whaley. He had no proof to sustain them. In his desperation and desire for revenge, he thought to paint such a horrible picture of political corruption and debauchery, in a general way, as to create such a feeling of horror and disgust in the minds of the committee that it would cause the committee to overlook the issue-the guilt or innocence of Whaley-and order an investigation so as to rid the State of the hideous evils that he claimed existed there.

He is a lawyer, and of course knows how to weigh evidence. He evidently knew that he did not have sufficient proof to make out a prima facie case. Therefore it strikes me that he never expected to sustain the charges, but his sole object was to harass and annoy Mr. Whaley as much as possible. No one who saw him before the committee could fail to see that he is full of malice, prejudice, and spleen against Whaley.

Frequent exhibitions of feeling were displayed. While one of his own witnesses was being examined, at a time when the witness was not discussing Whaley, or anything relating to him, Mr. Grace, in a burst of temper, struck his fists together and in an angry tone of voice denounced Whaley as a liar, using in that connection some very profane language. It is proper to remark that Whaley was not present.

Time after time, while his own witnesses were testifying, he would interrupt and inject into the record remarks that were entirely improper and of such character that they were stricken from the record.

His interest was such that he made a visit to the chairman of the committee while at his home in Ohio, besides numerous trips to this city. His feeling was so intense that he made threats against the chairman because he did not act in this matter as quickly as Grace thought he ought; and at one time, in the presence of the committee, he invited the chairman out of the room to fight.

Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that I have not uttered a single word of abuse of Mr. Grace, nor shall I do so in this argument. All that has been done was to call attention to the record and very largely his own language.

I recognize the fact that whether Mr. Grace is a good man or a bad man does not affect the guilt or innocence of Mr. Whaley; but in passing upon the testimony offered by himself we have the right to look to the character, interest, and motives of the man in order to determine what weight and credit should be given to his statements.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GRACE.

Let us now consider the testimony of Mr. Grace and find out what he has to say in regard to expenditures of money by or for Whaley. His charges were filed on information and When he came first before the committee he expressed himself as thinking that we should order an investigation simply because he had made the charges and because he was mayor of Charleston. When informed that he must produce proof, he brought witnesses, but gave no testimony himself, except to file his affidavit. This affidavit was not a statement in regard to any fact within his own knowledge, but was simply a matter of hearsay with him. It was filed on October 1.

The matter was held open until December 15. He was given the fullest opportunity to make any statement that he cared to make. On that date he appeared before the committee and made a statement, in which he said that at the second primary he saw Frank Simmons in a room distributing money for Whaley, and that he must have had as much as $2,000 on a table.

This statement is denied by Simmons. There are two reasons for believing that Simmons told the truth.

First, Grace endeavored to get Hon. Joseph T. Johnson, a Member of Congress from his State, to object to Mr. Whaley taking the oath of office. Mr. Johnson refused to do so unless he was furnished with proof of facts that would justify his action. This is all taken from Grace's statement, and he states further that he had no facts to give Mr. Johnson. Johnson wanted facts; Mr. Grace did not have them.

Wanted facts; Mr. Grace did not have them.

Mr. Stephens. Was there any instance at all that you could cite from your personal knowledge?

Mr. Grace. I went over the thing with them and told them what I had reason to think was spent at the time, and all that sort of business; but that was the clearest kind of speculation.

Mr. Stephens. You told them nothing except about the speculation?

Mr. Grace. That is all.

Mr. Stephens. So you could tell them nothing except what was a matter of opinion, could you?

Mr. Grace. That was practically it; yes, sir.

Mr. French. Practically what was told the committee in the first instance?

Mr. Grace. Yes, sir.

Mr. Stephens. Was there anything other than opinion recited to Mr. Daynson?

JOHNSON?

Mr. GRACE. No, sir; except I was in Washington, and all of my informants were in Charleston. It was in the mouths and on the lips of everybody, and newspapers were full of it, that it was awful. That was the substance of it. Now, then, I couldn't tell you who got the money, who sold his vote, and all that kind of business at that time. I think if I had brought a petition at that time and Mr. Whaley had called on me for proof I would have then been in a very ridiculous position, and you could have very well said that I had come up here and brought a petition which was based on something that I did not know anything about.

It is a rigidation of law to purchase very. If Cance saw

It is a violation of law to purchase votes. Simmons doing this, as he says he did, why did he not say to Mr. Johnson: Yes, I know that the law was violated; I saw it with my own eyes. He did not do so; but simply expressed his opinion to Johnson about what occurred at the election. His statement that if at the time he was talking to Johnson, which was several days after the election, "I had been called on for proof I would have been in a ridiculous position and it could have been very well said that I had brought a petition based on something that I did not know anything about," is a direct admission that he had no facts within his personal knowledge; therefore, Simmons is corroborated by Grace himself.

Again, the deportment of Mr. Grace before the committee was such as to show that he is high-strung, vindictive, insulting, and His statement of what was said between him and Simmons when he claims that he saw him spending such sums of money for Whaley do not harmonize with his conduct before the committee. According to his statement, Simmons had been his political friend and had deserted him for his political enemy at a time when Grace was fighting for his political life almost, yet he simply expressed surprise and regret. It will be pretty hard to make one believe this, who has seen his exhibitions of temper, who has heard him use profane language before the committee, and who has heard him extend an invitation to the chairman to engage in a fistic encounter.

In his statement before the committee Mr. Grace said:

In his statement before the committee Mr. Grace said:

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that I have definitely the names of the gentlemen who, with Mr. Whaley's knowledge and consent, organized and collected the immense campaign fund for Whaley, which was distributed through his office and with his knowledge, and in many cases he sent people to his cashier to get the money, amounting to thousands and thousands of dollars. That fund he collected from these people entirely on the theory that he was not fighting Grace.

Mr. French. Now, this is very interesting, and I think we ought to go further into it. Where was this money collected from?

Mr. Grace. Largely by Mr. Peters, who was afterwards appointed collector of the port after Mr. Whaley was nominated. He is now collector of the port. I have proof of this. It was collected by Mr. Peters and by Mr. McLeod, who was very much anti. * * * At that time McLeod and Peters organized a committee and collected campaign funds, which was used with Mr. Whaley's knowledge and consent.

Mr. French, How was it collected?

Mr. Grace. Some of it was collected from Mr. Whaley's relatives.

Mr. French. To what other sources did these people go to collect this money for Mr. Whaley's campaign?

Mr. Grace. I heard that $20,000 came from certain cotton-mill interests,

The Chairman. What cotton-mill interests?

Mr. Grace. At that time the question of cotton and the cotton schedule on southern cotton was an important question. The southern cotton people were maintaining a lobby here for the sake of getting a little better conditions, through the tariff bill, on manufactured goods which we manufactured, as against the New England mills.

Mr. FRENCH. Give us the names of those cotton mills.

Mr. Grace. Well, I could not.

The Chairman. Give us the names of those cotton mills that gave contributions.

Mr. Grace. I could not tell you that. I say this, Mr. Post: I have no definite information about this, but this is a presumption.

* *

Mr. Stephens. Now, let me say further that from hearsay you think that perhaps $20,000 was collected from cotton mills, and you admit that that is hearsay?

Mr. Grace. Yes, sir; on that point I have nothing but that.

Mr. Stephens. And because of that statement I think it is absolutely necessary that we should go further with you and find out whether it is hearsay with the other matters.

Mr. Grace. Well, I told you as to that that it is hearsay, and therefore you know on my word of honor that it is hearsay, and, on my word of honor, I tell you that the other is not hearsay.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Grace, if you know from whom Mr. Peters made his collections, tell it.

Mr. Grace. You ask me do I know that?

The CHAIRMAN. You said you did.

Mr. Grace. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Give us the names.

Mr. Grace. Well, F. D. Peters.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom did he make the collections?

Mr. Grace. In the first place, he was not only a collector, but a substantial contributor.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did he contribute?

Mr. Grace. I really do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, he made up a fund?

Mr. Grace. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, give us the names of those from whom he collected.

Mr. Grace. Well, Mr. Chairman, unless you compel me, I would like to go on with my story as far as I can. So far as giving the names to collected.

Mr. Grace. Well, Mr. Chairman, unless you compel me, I would like to go on with my story as far as I can. So far as giving the names to the committee—

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). To be frank with you, Mr. Grace, we are tired of having these hearsay matters. If you have anything substantial, lay it out upon the table in front of the committee. I ask you if you know who made the contributions to Mr. Peters? Let us have their names and where they live.

Mr. Grace. Well, Mr. Post, we might as well face the issue right now.

now.

The Chairman. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Grace. I have some stuff here to put in the record, and I do not want what I am going to put in by the answer I would give to go in first. I would like to put in my other stuff first, because I know when I answer that question that you are going to tell me that this investigation is at an end. In the meantime, I would like you to let me proceed in my own way.

Mr. GRACE. Well, as I do not know positively, except as I was told by what I considered reliable parties, who he collected the money from, I will answer that question by saying that now I am not in a position to answer it.

Mr. French. Were there other sources still? You have mentioned relatives; you have mentioned these industries that you said were interested in pending legislation. Were there others, or does that include the sources from which you understand the Whaley fund was collected?

Mr. Grace. The other sources I heard—it was rumored that it was the Southern Railway and the Consolidated Railway, which is a large local corporation, and one or two corporations whose interests have always been hostile to me. I said that there might be some truth in that. Of course, that is only inference.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the other man whom you said, besides Peters, collected a large fund?
Mr. GRACE Mr. McLeod.
The CHAIRMAN. How much money did he raise?
Mr. GRACE. They worked together—Mr. Peters and Mr. McLeod.
Mr. FRENCH. Do you know the source from which Mr. McLeod—Mr. GRACE (interposing). Not positively.
The CHAIRMAN. All you know about it is hearsay?
Mr. GRACE. All I know about it is hearsay.

I have quoted at considerable length from the statement of Mr. Grace in order to show that he gave no facts that had any evidential value. His statement is made up of hearsay, opinion, and speculation. He would claim to know facts, but when pressed upon any point had to admit that it was hearsny or that he was "not in position to answer." At one time he made the ridiculous proposition to give certain information if the committee would promise, under oath, not to divulge it. [Laughter.] He was willing to testify about this matter if the information could be kept in the bosom of the committee. a public matter under investigation. Why keep his testimony secret? My conclusion is that he was preparing to make a false statement and he did not want to give anyone an opportunity to catch him in it. According to my judgment, there is not one single bit of evidence in the whole story of Mr. Grace that even tends to support his charges.

H, LEON LARISEY-THE DETECTIVE

This man Larisey was employed by Mr. Grace to work up evidence against Whaley. He was paid between $600 and $700 for his service. The larger part of his work was done in the four counties of Berkeley, Colleton, Clarendon, and Dorchester. He filed a statement giving the names of at least 200 men living in these counties, who had either handled money for Mr. Whaley or who had knowledge of its use, stating that these men would testify to these facts. All this was hearsay with him, of course.

I will refer to a few of the statements as examples of what he had to say: Dr. W. B. Ackerman handled Whaley funds very extensively; he does not deny it; A. A. Patterson was also very active, and made no secret of having Whaley funds; Judge Hutchinson handled Whaley funds, stated by M. J. Egan; E. D. Jaudon handled money for Whaley. There are several printed pages made up of matter of like character.

Nearly every man whom Larisey mentioned has made an affi-davit denying the truthfulness of his statements. It may be said that it is but natural that the men charged with handling money for Whaley would deny it. If so, I ask why should men who did not handle money swear falsely? Larisey mentioned scores of men who, so he said, simply had knowledge of such transactions. There was no reason for them to perjure themselves. Many of these men were opposed to Whaley and actively supported his opponent. Among them were farmers, merchants, doctors, lawyers, and county and district officers. Men of all classes denounce his statements as false and state that so far as they know, or have reason to believe, that in their respective communities there was no violation of the election laws.

In these affidavits there is to be found some strong language in regard to Larisey. One man says: I have found him anything but honest; a stranger to the truth.

Another said:

I know his reputation for truth and veracity and would not believe him on oath.

Mr. Grace did not pay a very high tribute to his character.

I am not a very strong believer in the testimony of a detective. A man who engages in the business of procuring evidence for pay is usually more careful about securing his money than he is about the methods he uses in securing testimony. Whenever it is shown that a detective bears a bad reputation, then whatever he may state, although under oath, has very little weight with me.

When before the committee Mr. Larisey was asked about the result of a lawsuit between the Exchange Banking & Trust Co. and H. F. Towles. Larisey had transferred to the bank a mortgage purporting to have been given him by Towles. One of the defenses set up was that Larisey had forged the instrument. The court instructed the jury that "you will answer the question, Did H. F. Towles execute the Larisey mortgage?" He claimed that the case was decided in his favor. I quote the

The CHAIRMAN. If I understand you, you claim that you were completely exonerated in this case?

Mr. LARISEY, Absolutely.

The court records show that the jury rendered its verdict in favor of Towles. In addition to this Larisey produced a letter from his attorneys in an effort to refute the idea that he had not paid his fee, which also shows that he lost his case. The introduction of the letter places him in the attitude of proving against himself that he is guilty of perjury in an effort to relieve himself of the charges of failing to pay a debt.

A jury of his county by solemn verdict pronounced him a forger; he testified falsely before the committee, and proved it on himself; many of his fellow citizens state that he is wholly unreliable and unworthy of belief. Therefore it is not at all surprising that the committee did not give any credence to his

H. F. HOGAN.

Another witness was H. F. Hogan. He told a lengthy story. It was in large part hearsay. However, he stated some things of his own knowledge. He said that Whaley tried to get him to handle money for him and offered him $50. This was denied by Whaley and by other persons. He stated also that he saw money used in the purchase of votes for Whaley

That you may determine what credit to give the testimony of this witness, it is proper that you know something of him. He is the man that Mr. Grace said "realized that he had done something for him," because he allowed him to continue in the blind-tiger business. He operated "one of the lowest negro dives" in the city of Charleston by permission of Mayor Grace. At the present time he is on the police force of that city, placed there by Mr. Grace. It is a significant fact that he was placed on the force just 11 days before Mr. Grace brought him here to testify.

STEPHEN W. SARGENT.

All the witnesses who gave oral testimony were directly connected with Grace either by employment or as employees of the city, except Sargent. He stated that two men told him that they had been paid for their votes by a friend of Whaley, and another man said that he had been offered money. This was purely hearsay. He knew nothing of it of his own knowledge.

He also made the statement that Whaley spent $8,000 in ward 9 at the second primary. This statement was not based on knowledge of any facts. He was asked, "What is your judgment as to the amount that Whaley spent?" His answer "From the money I have previously spent in that ward and my experience there, I would not hesitate to say that Whaley spent not less than $8,000 in the second primary.

This answer shows the character of the man. He had not seen a dollar spent by Whaley or anyone for him; he had heard of only two men being paid any money—only a few dollars; yet he deliberately swears that Whaley spent in that ward $8,000. I submit that a man who is so reckless in his statements is unworthy of belief.

CHARACTER OF OTHER WITNESSES.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say that reference has been made to the fact that seven witnesses were offered by Grace before the committee, and the gentleman from Wisconsin stated that they told their story in a straightforward manner. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Elder] has already recited what Grace would say to them about telling or not telling certain things, and I go further and assert in the presence of the full committee who saw these men that not a single witness that Grace offered would answer any important question without first looking into the face of Grace to see whether or not he should I believe they did it to see what he wanted them answer it. to say. They sat there and kept their eyes glued on the face of Grace, their master; they were men in the employ of the city under him, and they came there to do his bidding, and they only needed a nod or a sign or some indication from him as to what their answer should be.

I shall not undertake to go into a discussion of the other witnesses, nor their statements, as fully as with those already referred to. It will be interesting to look over the list of

Among the number we find C. Conclin, policeman; M. J. Barry, member of the "grass gang"; J. W. Moore, policeman; George Plough, policeman; Benjamin Rudduck, street sweeper; Farclo, blind-tiger keeper; J. Burns, a beggar and bum; T. E. Gleason, a loafer and hanger-on; Robert Smart, the same; T. E. Gleason, a loafer and hanger-on; Robert Smart, the same; M. H. Fulcher, city employee; A. H. Brouthers, runs gambling house; Samuel D. Barshay, blind-tiger keeper; E. E. Harbeson, blind-tiger keeper; A. Seebeck, blind-tiger keeper; M. Bazarr, city employee; Philip Fash, blind-tiger keeper; F. Brandes, blind-tiger keeper; F. Brandes, blind-tiger keeper; F. Brandes, blind-tiger keeper; J. J. Hilton, who Grace says is not a man of character; Darby Sanders, of whom Grace said "I would not call him a man of high character"; John Aulsberry, policeman; O. L. Clubb, a notorious vagabond; A. F. Dunlap, who was appointed policeman after the election; and C. J. Bresnihan, garbage inspector. WHERE WERE THE GOOD CITIZENS

It has been stated that the use of money was so open and notorious that it was being talked of all over the district. It was said that votes were publicly bought. Several witnesses testified that they saw men with large rolls of money. One witness, when asked to give the size of the roll, held his hands at least 12 inches apart. Another claimed to have seen a man with a roll of money "as large as a man's hat." Others claimed to have seen men with hundreds and thousands of dollars publicly buying votes.

These statements were made by men of the character I have described—Mr. Grace and his henchmen, blind-tiger keepers, bums, loafers, and city employees under him.

The city of Charleston has a population of 65,000 and the district a population of about 200,000. It is very remarkable that no good citizen saw these things going on. Not a farmer, lawyer, doctor, minister, merchant, or business man has testified to any such thing, although the witnesses would have us believe that the work was openly and publicly done in many instances. If the morals, political or otherwise, of the first district of South Carolina are in the keeping of men like the ones Grace produced as witnesses, then God save the district!

SOME CROOKED WORK.

Mr. Grace filed an affidavit made by one M. Bazar. man is a foreigner, and can neither read nor write the English language. He made a later affidavit, in which he said that C. J. Bresnihan, one of Grace's underlings, took him to Mr. Grace's office and had him to make the first affidavit without informing him of its contents, and that it did not state the truth.

Mr. Grace also filed an affidavit made by Frank Fosberry. Fosberry made another affidavit denying the truthfulness of the first, and stated that this same man Bresnihan got him drunk, took him to the law office of Mr. Grace, and while in an intoxicated condition he was induced to make the affidavit.

Another witness, whose name I do not recall, repudiated an affidavit filed by Mr. Grace, saying that he had not only not signed such an instrument but never heard of it until after it had been presented here.

It is also shown that H. Leon Larisey, the detective, offered to pay one L. B. Simonds if he would make affidavit to certain things against Whaley.

AN INTERESTING STATEMENT.

Mr. Grace made a statement that was a strange one, coming from the source it did. I doubt if the force of it appealed to him. He said that Whaley was preparing, just before the result of the second primary was determined, to contest Mr. Hughes's right to the nomination because of illegal expenditures of money by Hughes.

If Whaley had been guilty of the conduct alleged against him, if he had openly and notoriously bought votes, as Grace said he did, and, in the face of all this, was preparing to prefer charges against Hughes, he must be a fit subject for the lunatic asylum. The very fact that he was preparing his contest is proof to show that he felt that he had violated no law, either in the expenditure of money or otherwise. It is a strong refutation of the charges against him.

WHALEY'S APPEAL TO VOTERS.

Mr. Grace offered in evidence a letter issued by Mr. Whaley on the day of the last primary. He closed the letter with these words:

This, therefore, is my final appeal to my friends and to all the people who desire fair play and an honest election. Whether they intend to vote for my opponent or for me, let nothing keep them from the ballot box to-day. Let each one register his opinion by casting his vote for the man whom he thinks will better represent him and the district in the Halls of Congress; and after voting I ask that everyone who is interested in the welfare of his community and wishes to rid it of questionable politics remain at the polling place for as long a time as he can spare from his business or occupation to watch the proceedings. None need be afraid of any unpleasantness. The corraptionist is also a moral coward and will not prosecute his nefarious pursuit in the light of day. The presence of honest men will discourage dishonest practices.

You will note that he asked every voter to remain at the polls and be on watch for any corrupt politics. After making such a request, do you believe that he would have offered to buy votes himself or permit his friends to go around with money in rolls containing thousands of dollars and openly and notoriously purchase votes? The question answers itself. lowed up his letter by such conduct, he did a most foolish thing, because he had put the people on guard and directed attention to his own misconduct.

NO PARTISANSHIP OR SECTIONALISM.

Mr. Speaker, this matter was considered by a committee of nine members. Seven have voted to dismiss the charges. This determination was not reached because of any feeling or partisanship, because of the ones who voted to dismiss the charges five are Democrats, one is a Republican, and one a Progressive. Neither was the determination of the case the result of any sectional feeling. Of the seven, four came from Northern States.

I refer to this matter because of an article recently published by Mr. Grace, in which he uses this language:

What is all this talk in Washington about the interests of the "southern wing" of Democracy requiring the Whaley investigation to be suppressed?

This is ridiculous. Of course there has been no such talk, at least from any respectable source. If any such suggestion has been made, I never heard of it.

In the same article Mr. Grace uses this language in referring to the element that supported Mr. Whaley and in his reference to Mr. Post, the chairman of the committee:

That element was also on the side of slavery, and later on (along with Mr. Whaley) on the side of child and woman slavery in the cotton mills, as his legislative record proves. But since when has that been the test of "bestness" in the Democratic Party? Not since "the best element" in this very city first fired on the American flag and until, as it was supposed, chastened by experience, it was again the other day intrusted with power. Who is Mr. Post, that, at the mandate of the false leadership of the party, he should reverse the logic of history and, in favor of the old oligarchy, once more begin in the first South Carolina district to fire upon the genius of the American flag?

This is in line with his wild statements made before the committee, and is but another evidence of the length to which he will go in order to strike an enemy. To attempt to inject into the case the old feeling of sectionalism that resulted from the Civil War and the slavery question is not only in bad taste but thoroughly contemptible. His references to the negroes being in the majority in the district, to their exclusion from politics, to slavery, to the part that Charleston played in the Civil War, and so forth, were all made for the purpose of arousing sectional feeling; but it has all failed to have any such effect, as each Member voted according to his conscientious belief in the matter.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Grace has brought a serious indictment not only against Mr. Whaley but against his city, county, district, and State. He has wholly failed to prove his case. convinced that this whole proceeding was inspired by malice, that it is an effort to harass and annoy a political enemy, that witnesses of the lowest type have been produced to prove the charges, that perjury has been committed by the wholesale. After weeding out the matters of hearsay and opinion and the testimony that was shown to be false, there is nothing of a substantial nature that will justify any further action in the matter. Therefore I shall support the resolution to dismiss the charges, as I am unwilling to immolate Richard S. Whaley on the altar of the malice, ill will, and perjuries of witnesses whose character has been described to you. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. All time has expired, and the question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Frear] for the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the demand.

Mr. FREAR. Then I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute resolution may be

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the substitute resolution be reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the substitute resolution, as follows:

Whereas Elections Committee No. 1, to which was referred charges filed by John P. Grace, an elector residing in the first congressional district of the State of South Carolina, against Richard S. Whaley, a Member of this House, representing that district, has held hearings at the city of Washington in order to determine the necessity for asking for authority whereby to conduct an investigation into the facts, and pursuant thereto has filed a record of its proceedings and its report thereon:

Resolved, That the charges filed by said John P. Grace against said Richard S. Whaley, together with all accompanying records, be referred to a select committee of seven Members, with power to hold sessions at such place or places as may be found most convenient, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a cierk and stenographer, and that said committee be authorized and directed to investigate the allegations of said memorial and report to this House; and the expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 227, answered "present" 3, not voting 105, as follows:

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4145. An act to authorize the Government of Porto Rico to construct two bridges across the Arecibo River near the city of Arecibo, P. R.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. McCumber as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 834. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 833. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 832. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Overman, Mr. Chilton, and Mr. Clark of Wyoming as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN COAL FIELDS, COLORADO, AND COPPER MINES, MICHIGAN.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 387.

House resolution 387.

Resolved, That the House Committee on Mines and Mining is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields in the counties of Las Animas, Huerfano, Fremont, Grand, Routt, Boulder, Weld, and other counties in the State of Colorado; and in and about the copper mines in the counties of Houghton, Keweenaw, and Ontonagon, in the State of Michigan, for the purpose of ascertaining—

Fifth. Sixth. Investigate and report whether or not firearms, ammunition, and explosives have been shipped into the said coal and copper fields, with the purpose to exclude the products of the said fields from competitive markets in interstate trade; and if so, by whom and by whom paid for.

"The expenses thereof shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. MANN. Is that an amendment?

Mr. MANN. Is that an amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; to strike that out.

Mr. Speaker, I will ask the members of the Rules Committee on the other side how much time would they like to have?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me, I do not think that question ought to be determined by gentlemen all of whom favor the resolution. Under the rules of the House some gentleman opposed to this is entitled to control the time in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would speak

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I was just suggesting my information is the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Kansas both favor the adoption of this resolution as well as the gentleman from Illinois, who reports it for the committee. Being opposed to its adoption, I am submitting to the Chair that in any arrangement made for the control of the time I am entitled to control time in opposition to the adoption of the

Mr. FOSTER. I judge that the ranking member on the other side will treat the gentleman fairly.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not a question of his having a right to do it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the resolution, and I assume that the time ought to be divided between those who favor and those who oppose it. All of us on this side are in favor of it. I think the majority that voted the resolution out of the committee are on this side of the House. It might, therefore, be proper for me to control the time in favor of the resolution and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARD-WICK] to control the time in opposition to it. What has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] to say about that propo-

Mr. FOSTER. There were no votes in the committee against reporting the resolution. I do not think the gentleman would pretend that. While there might not have been any record vote, yet there was not any opposition to it being reported, as the gentleman will recall.

Mr. CAMPRELL, I had understood that a majority of the Democratic members were opposed to the resolution, and if the gentleman from Georgia desires time in opposition to it I could not yield it to him. If the gentleman from Illinois has any time to yield in opposition, those opposed to the resolution would

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman being in favor of the resolution, whether under the circumstances he would be in control of the time I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. My colleague is entitled to an hour under the

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir,

Mr. MANN. If he proceeds to discuss the resolution. Why can not that time be divided between the gentlemen in favor and the gentlemen against the resolution?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my colleague there is no intention on my part to deprive the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK of having time. I would like for him to have it, and, if it is satisfactory, I would ask unanimous consent that at the end of one hour the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir. Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If that be the arrangement, and one hour be given the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to ask him if it would be possible for us to have 20 minutes of it for one of the gentlemen introducing this resolution, in regard to Michigan?

Mr. FOSTER. I think 20 minutes for one of the gentlemen introducing the resolution would be a little long, because there is one gentleman on this side of the House who introduced a resolution, and he would be entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. How much time would the gentleman be willing to yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Twenty minutes out of the hour.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Inasmuch as this matter affects Michigan somewhat, I am wondering whether or not the Michigan Members of the House will have any time given them? We have not had any so far. I think we ought to have some con-

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman, if he is in opposi-tion to the resolution, I would be glad to divide up the time, so that those opposed to it would have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Might I not suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fosters] that whether the gentlemen from Michigan or the gentlemen from Colorado are opposed to this resolution or not, that some Members might desire, very properly, to be heard in relation to some phases of this resolution, and that they ought to have an opportunity?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hamilton] is entirely right.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], in opposition to the resolution, and the other half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, before that request is put I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think an hour rather a short time, and whether he could not with propriety make it at least an hour and a half? It is possible we may not use that much time.

Mr. MANN. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We are not likely to adjourn before 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the gentleman has the power under the rules of the House to move the previous question at any time within the hour, and the time he grants is really in the way of grace; but why not make it 40 minutes on a side? That will close the debate by 6 o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. I am perfectly willing to do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] asks unanimous consent that debate on this proposition be limited to 80 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by himself and 40 by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as or-Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire, as a Representative from Michigan, if there is a prospect of my having five minutes in case I should want it?

Mr. FOSTER. In favor? Mr. CRAMTON. In favor of the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I can not promise any gentleman any specific mount of time. I will do the best I can to divide it equally. amount of time. among the Members.

Mr. CRAMTON. We are unaware as to what discussion there may be as to the officials of Michigan, and so forth.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I shall do what I can, but I would not like to promise any particular amount of time,

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me? Mr. DYER.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I wanted to ask the gentleman if, when the resolution is taken up and read, there will be an opportunity then for amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. There will not.

Mr. DYER. There will be no opportunity for amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. No; unless by unanimous consent. Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] a question.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well. Mr. GORMAN. The latter part of this resolution has been stricken out by an amendment. As the resolution now stands, no provision is made for paying the expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. There is not. That is the duty of the Committee on Accounts, I will state to my colleague, to bring in a resolution providing for whatever expense there may be.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no provision in this resolution requiring this committee to make a report or recommendation of any kind. Does it occur to the gentleman that the adoption of this resolution in its present form might mean that we might spend a great deal of time here and the committee might spend a great deal of time in investigating, without the committee having the power to make a report to this House?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Committee on Mines and Mining has the right to have such printing and binding done as is necessary and to make a report. It is usual to do that. I do not think there will be any doubt about making a report if the investigation is ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. The question I had in mind was that the resolution directing the committee to make the investigation did not require them to make a report.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Mines and Mining is a regular committee, and it has the right to make a report.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what is going on over there?

Mr. FOSTER. I was just answering an inquiry of my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] with reference to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] that this debate shall be limited to 80 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by himself and 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and that at the end of 80 minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia

[Mr. HARDWICK] if I can have 15 minutes?

Mr. HARDWICK. Surely. Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I presume that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will give time to those on this side of the House who are in favor of the resolution-if I get the gentleman's attention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will please give his attention to the inquiry of the gentleman

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my friend from Kansas, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not keep any time myself, but I shall try to divide up the time between those on this side of the House who are in favor of and those who are against the resolu-

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman from Illinois will be fair to this side of the House and give a fair proportion of the time to those who are in favor of the resolution, I shall not object.

Mr. MANN. The gentlemen from Illinois are always fair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foster] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keat-Ing] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, it is scarcely necessary for me to occupy the five minutes allotted to me. I have been discussing this resolution with Members of this House and the executive officers of this Government for three months, and it is time for me to surrender the stage and give my colleagues a chance to be heard.

I want to congratulate the Members of this House upon the unanimity they have displayed upon this question, and I am particularly glad that the Members on the Republican side of the aisle are just as anxious as the Members on this side of the aisle that we should go into the situation in Colorado. So far as Colorado is concerned, we have apparently the same unanimity of feeling, because the coal operators of my State assure us that they want this investigation to be pressed, and the miners have petitioned this House on a number of occasions asking for the appointment of this committee.

The situation in Colorado briefly is this: A strike was de-clared in the coal mines of the State some four months ago. Twelve thousand men are affected. During the progress of the strike perhaps a hundred lives have been lost. The coal operators are represented by three great companies, the most important of which is owned by the Rockefeller interests. These companies have insisted that they "had nothing to arbitrate." The Labor Department and various other representatives of the Government have made repeated attempts to bring about an understanding. All these attempts have failed, because the operators have taken the position that they would not consider any proposition looking to arbitration.

My friends, the people of Colorado trust that this investigation will produce the same results in our State that the Senate investigation produced in the State of West Virginia. They had similar conditions in that State, and after the Senate committee had visited the State and had laid bare all the facts in connection with the controversy, public opinion, the most powerful weapon for good in this country, compelled a settlement.

I am not going into the legal questions involved. Even if I had plenty of time it would be impossible for me to do that: but I think it is a pretty safe proposition to lay down that this House has as great power as the Senate of the United States, and the resolution you are about to vote upon is practically a duplicate of the resolution passed by the United States Senate after a very extended debate, and which brought industrial peace to the State of West Virginia.

Now, if the United States Senate could conduct that sort of an investigation and bring about those results, surely the House of Representatives can bring them about.

And I want to say to gentlemen who are inclined to quibble about legal technicalities that we have stretched the Constitution in this country so that it very effectually covers the dollar, and what we are asking is that you stretch it a little further, so that it will cover the man. That is our proposition in a nutshell. We want this committee to go out to Colorado. We want them to probe to the very bottom of this cancer, and we believe that the radium of publicity will prove an effective remedy. [Applause.

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield before he

Mr. KEATING. I will yield if I have the time.

committee to go into the question, if it deems it proper and merited, as to whether or not there have been either operators or labor organizations outside of Colorado that have been in-terested and have taken part in this trouble, and are partly responsible for it? Is the resolution broad enough to allow the committee to go into that question and investigate that phase

Mr. KEATING. I will say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, the results in West Virginia have demonstrated that the right kind of a committee, operating under this kind of a resolution, clothed with these powers, can get at all the facts that the people of this country want to know. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield back his time? Mr. KEATING. Yes; I yield back any time I have left. The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used it all.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MacDonald].

Mr. MacDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not more time in which to discuss this matter, because I believe that there are questions of vital importance that ought to be discussed in relation to this resolution that can not be adequately presented in the time allotted to me.

I do not desire to obtrude my personal affairs into the discussion, but I do wish to say that since I introduced this resolution I have brought down upon my head an avalanche of criticism and attack, such as I believe has seldom been equaled before, from the press controlled by the interests that are opposing this investigation, and others whom they apparently The attack is significant, because I have been doing nothing but advocating a resolution that will bring out the The truth in a situation of this kind will harm no one who is right.

The Calumet strike has continued for six months. Events have happened from time to time that have absolutely startled the country at large, until the condition there has become such as can be truthfully characterized as a national scandal, and one that ought to be investigated. The conditions there are fundamental ones. That country has been controlled for a great many years by large corporate influences. In that part of the country there are no industries practically except the mines, and the mining companies are corporations of very large capitalization, having their seat of financial power in the large cities of the East for the most part.

During the entire history of that country they have absolutely dominated every activity of that locality—social, industrial, political, and every other. We have had no labor troubles in that country, because heretofore there have been no labor organizations. These corporations have dominated the industrial situation autocratically. But now the time has come—it has been coming gradually for three or four years—when the laboring men in these industries are irresistibly demanding some voice in the administration of these industries as to hours of labor, wages, and so forth, as an organized body. And when they made these demands they were met by the proposition on the part of the mine owners that they would not recognize the idea of organization at all, that the only basis of settlement, the only basis of treatment that the situation would receive at their hands was the basis of treating with the individual employee upon their pay roll, and no one else.

Efforts have been made by the Labor Department of the United States and by the governor of Michigan to bring about some basis of settlement, but all offers of mediation have been refused by the companies.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacDONALD. Certainly. Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that they refused to employ members of the union as individuals?

Mr. MacDONALD. Yes; it was proposed to let the men go back to work, without anything being said about anything else except to retain their union membership, and the proposition was refused. The only proposition that would be considered was that the men must resign from the union and not again become members of the union.

Now, as I say, these are two fundamental propositions confronting each other. Early in this matter the civil government of the county absolutely broke down. Within 48 hours of the time of declaring the strike every single member of the Michigan National Guard was on the ground and at the disposition of the mine owners. At the same time the office of the sheriff in the county was turned over to a strike-breaking corporation called the Waddell-Mahone Corporation, of New York, which imported a large number of gunmen, and Mr. Waddell Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state to the House whether actually himself took possession of the sheriff's office and or not, in his view, this resolution is broad enough to allow the

The troops have gradually been withdrawn and the sheriff and the Waddell-Mahone Corporation and the Asher Agency have controlled the situation with their guards, some imported men, and some local deputies.

Now, the situation that is brought about is this: These men, many of them simply strangers from the large cities, brought in there and given absolute authority, armed and sent out among the people, have grossly abused their authority. During the six months of the strike there have been nine murders committed

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacDONALD. Yes. Mr. FRANCIS. Does the gentleman mean to say that outside detectives have been brought in there and that they have been given official positions in the county?

Mr. MacDONALD. They have been made deputy sheriffs and have actually been in charge of the processes of law in that county. They have arrested literally hundreds of people.

county. They have arrested literally hundreds of people.

Mr. FRANCIS. Although they are not citizens of the State, but are nonresidents?

Mr. MacDONALD. Yes; nonresidents; and although we have a law on the statute books of Michigan providing that no one who has not been a resident of the locality for three months can be deputized.

Now, I have not the time to give you the situation in detail, but I want to impress on you the horrible results that this situation has brought about. I will confine myself to instances that are undisputed and unquestioned. Early in December two striking miners were going to their homes from the railroad striking inners were going to their nomes from the rainfold station. They insisted on taking a short cut that they were accustomed to follow. They were told by the four Waddell guards not to take that path, but they persisted and went on to their homes. They were followed by the four Waddell guards and two local deputy sheriffs to their house. Without any preliminaries these guards opened fire upon that house and killed two of the inmates.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman. Mr. MacDONALD. I want to finish this case, because it is what I consider a terrible example of what took place there. The guards opened fire on the house and killed two of the inmates and slightly injured a child in its mother's arms. These Waddell guards were spirited out of the country, but under the pressure of public opinion they were returned by the sheriff and put on trial for murder. The prosecuting officer characterized it as wanton murder. They were admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000, and the bail was furnished by the mining companies. From that moment up to the 10th of this month, when Gov. Ferris made an examination and brought out the facts, the four Waddell guards have been in charge of the police work of the county. The prosecuting officer of the county told me on a recent visit there that he was embarrassed in the discharge of his duty by coming in contact continually with these men whom he had charged with murder and who were continuing their work as armed police officers of the county.

Now, that is an instance of things that have been going on.

There are other matters that have become of national knowledge on account of the reports that have been made in the press. But I want to say that there are literally hundreds of cases where individual citizens have had their constitutional rights absolutely disregarded and trampled upon by these armed guards. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan

has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kelley].

Mr. Kelley of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the State of Michigan, of course, is perfectly willing that anything that has been going on in our State in connection with this strike shall be investigated by the Federal Government, if that investigation will contribute in any way to the solution of the vexed problems affecting capital and labor. I do not rise to oppose this resolution because Michigan is unwilling that this situation shall be investigated, but I oppose the resolution for two reasons, which I shall hereafter state. So far as the contest against organized labor is concerned in this strike, I desire to say that this is an era of organization. Capital is organizing—organizing in our State and everywhere else. One of the greatest corporations operating in Michigan is the United States Steel Corporation. That corporation has 200,000 stockholders. It employs more men, I am told, than fought at Gettysburg. It supports more people than live in a great State like Nebraska. It owns more land than Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont. It makes more steel than Germany. It floats a larger navy than Italy. It employs more capital than all of the banks in New York. So, of course, when capital organizes and is protected in so doing, naturally, labor organizes on the other side, and I think the time has undoubtedly come when the wisest leaders of industry in the country are reaching the point where they are willing to concede to labor the same privilege in regard to organization that they claim for themselves. That is my position upon the matter of labor organizations.

Mr. Speaker, I have been amazed, in going over the history of labor disputes, to see how extensive has been the contest between labor and capital. The first annual report of the United States Commissioner of Labor, issued September, 1907, was devoted to strikes and lockouts from 1881 to 1905, and these startling facts stare us in the face: During those 25 years there occurred 36,754 strikes and 1,546 lockouts in the United States, Strikes occurred in 181,407 establishments, and in 18,547 there were lockouts. The number of persons who went out on strike was 6,728,048, and the number locked out, 716,231. The total number of persons thrown out of employment during that period of 25 years because of strikes was 8,703,824, and then following on, year after year, I have tabulated here the leading strikes which took place in the United States from that time up to the year 1913:

The strike of the bituminous miners extended over 10 States and lasted from March to July. Three hundred thousand men were in-Telegraphers' strike. Lasted from August until November. Fifteen thousand operators were out.

Strike of the longshoremen in New York and Brooklyn, involving 12,000 men. Series of severe conflicts between strikers and strikebreakers, many suffering physical injuries.

Miners' strike on the Mesabi Range, Minn., involving 10,000 men.

In August occurred a strike in the Birmingham coal district in Alabama. This strike was accompanied by unusual violence. On August 8, rioting resulted in the killing of 3 and the wounding of 11. Four houses dynamited and numerous arrests made. State militia called. Strike which involved several thousand was declared off in September.

Strike of the shirt-waist makers in New York started November 22 and continued into the new year. Involved 40,000 young women, and was the largest strike of women in the history of the country. Sympathetic strike of 7,000 in Philadelphia started December 20 and lasted into the new year.

July 1,7000 members of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers struck, stopping operation in 190 mills. Affected four States and lasted until December.

Strike of the workers in the Pressed Steel Car Co. at McKees Rock, Pa., and other points. Five thousand strikers. The strike lasted eight weeks. Several thousand strike breakers recruited from New York. Their arrival was attended by rioting, in which 12 rioters and police were killed, and numerous attempts made to destroy the works. Strike lasted until September 6.

Strike of the Georgia Central Railroad was a notable instance of the complication of the race question with labor troubles.

November 30, strike of switchmen on 13 different roads in the West. The strike had the effect of bringing freight transportation in the Northwest to an immediate standstill, entailing enormous losses to many lines of business and throwing thousands of men in various occupations out of work. Strike continued about a month, affecting 2,300 men.

The greatest American strike of the year, and probably the greatest ever carried on in a single community in the United States, as regards the number of workers and the capital involved, was the strike of the cloak makers in New York City. Began early in July and was settled September 2. The total number of strikers was variously estimated at from 70,000 to 85,000.

Chicago garment workers strike, starting in October and continuing until the close of the year, involving 40,000 persons. Numerous riots, and two persons killed.

Columbus street railway strike, beginning in July and lasting until October, cost the State $250,000. The violence amounted almost to a state of anarchy, and five regiments of militia were hurried to the scene. Unusual amount of shooting and destruction of property. City terrorized at various times.

The most spectacular strike of the year in this country was that of the Lawrence textile workers in January. Involved 4,000 workers in the cotton mills and 29,000 workers in the woolen mills. Strike ended by March 15. Cost the manufacturers and the strikers between $1,000,000 and $5,000,000. Strike occurred simultaneously with the Lawrence strike at Lowell and Clinton, Mass.; Barre, Vt.; Passaic, N. J.; Little Falls, N. Y., and various places in Pennsylvania.

In February and March, a strike involving 7,000 workers in the silk mills of Paterson.

In March and April, 3,000 strikers in the cotton mills near Utica, N. Y., accompanied by the calling of the State troops and much rioting. In April, strike of 15,000 carpenters of Chicago and other near-by cities.

cities.

In May, strike of 5,000 freight handlers in Chicago and 2,000 laborers at Newark.

May 31, 5,000 waiters in the restaurants and hotels in New York City, lasting until June 25.

Strike of 3,000 cablemakers at Perth Amboy, N. J., attended by rioting resulting in fatalities.

Strike of 5,000 foreign laborers near Newark, N. J., attended by the shooting of several officers and the killing of four strikers and a high-school student.

In July, a big strike in Atlantic ports involving 30,000 persons; rioting and fatalities.

In September strikes were in progress in coal-mining communities in West Virginia and Colorado; in firearms works in Hartford, Conn.; among the trackmen on the Pittsburg & Lake Erie Raliroad, and among the 6,000 Greek and Cretan workers in copper, lead, and silver mines in Bingham, Utah., as well as the strike of 9,000 miners at Panther Creek Valley, Pa. in Bingham, Utah., as well as the strike of 9,000 miners at Panther Creek Valley, Pa.

In October 35,000 employees in copper mining in Ely, Nev., struck for higher pay.

December 30 began a strike of the employees in the men's and children's ready-made clothing industry of New York, involving at least 100,000.

Because of these disturbances in the industrial world of the country Congress in 1912 passed a general act under which all of these matters might be investigated. If the Members of the House will bear with me, I would like to read the provisions of this important statute:

[PUBLIC-No. 300.] [H. R. 21094.]

An act to create a Commission on Industrial Relations.

[Fublic—No. 300.]

[H. R. 21094.]

An act to create a Commission on Industrial Relations.

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created to be called the Commission on Industrial Relations. Said commission shall be composed of nine persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not less than three of whom shall be employers of labor and not less than three of whom shall be representatives of organized labor. The Department of Commerce and Labor is authorized to cooperate with said commission in any manner and to whatever extent the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may approve.

SEC. 2. That the members of this commission shall be paid actual traveling and other necessary expenses and in addition a compensation of $10 per diem while actually engaged on the work of the commission is authorized as a whole, or by subcommittees of the commission, duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel testimony, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stemographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for such books, stationery, and other supplies, and to have only purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies, and to have only on the purposes for which such commission is created, and to authorize its members or its employees to travel in or outside the United States on the business of the commission.

SEC. 3. That said commission may report to the Congress its findings and recommendations and submit the testimony taken from time to time, and shall make a final report accompanied by the testimony not previously submitted not later than three years after the date of the approval of this act, at which time the term of this commission shall expire with the making of its final report; and the commission shall expire with the making of its final report, and the com Provided, That no portion of this money shall be paid except upon the order of said commission, signed by the chairman thereof: Provided, That the commission may expend not to exceed $5,000 per annum for the employment of experts at such rate of compensation as may be fixed by the commission, but no other person employed hereunder by the commission, except stenographers temporarily employed for the purpose of taking testimony, shall be paid compensation at a rate in excess of $3,000 per annum.

Approved, August 23, 1912.

A commission, organized under the provisions of this law, is now in existence, appointed by President Wilson, and ready to do business. The membership of this committee is as follows: E. P. Walsh, John R. Commons, Mrs. J. B. Harriman, F. A. Delano, Harris Weinstock, S. T. Ballard, John B. Lennon, James O'Connell, and Austin Garretson.

The Congress of the United States, realizing the magnitude of this great problem, which disturbed business conditions in 185,000 establishments in the 25 years from 1881 until 1907, passed a general act in 1912 creating this commission to inquire into every phase of strikes in all sections of the country and in every industry, empowered it to subpæna witnesses, to take testimony, and to report the testimony so taken to this House. Now, that is the wisest way. What will the Committee on Mines do if empowered to make this investigation? Probably half the members of that committee will go to Colorado to stay a few days and perhaps the other half of it will go into northern Michigan for a few days to investigate strikes that have been in progress for months. If investigation is to be made it should be made by the Industrial Commission, because-

1. The examination must be thorough, and a committee of Congress could not take the time.

2. The members of this commission are especially qualified for the work and have all the necessary machinery by which the investigation can be made,

3. If the best information is to be had, all these investigations should be conducted by the same persons, so that every situation will be approached from the same general angle.

4. If investigations in Michigan and Colorado are to go forward simultaneously, one portion of the committee will have to work in one State and one portion in the other, and the House will therefore be deprived of such views as may result from a comparative study of the two situations.

5. The chances for exercising the good offices of the Government by way of conciliation would be greater if the examination is conducted by the Industrial Commission, for the reason that it is not created for this particular purpose, and the members can not be accused of being appointed for the purpose of advancing the interest of any party or person.

6. Because it is a nonpartisan commission and will not be subjected to the suspicion of acting for party purposes

If an investigation seems advisable, why do we not request the Industrial Commission by resolution of this House, if you desire to do so, to investigate these strikes? Why not have these two strikes investigated by the commission already in existence, a commission that will have the confidence of the country, having been created for the great purpose of finding out the whole strike situation of the country?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, is that the Industrial Commission?

Mr. KEILEY of Michigan. Yes. It has already been appointed; it is doing business. President Wilson has named the commissioners, as I have told you. Three of them represent labor, three of them represent the industries, and three of them are not connected with either-nine in all. They can go to Calumet to-morrow, stay as long as necessary, call in witnesses, take testimony, and bring back to this House a report upon which we can base intelligent action. I am not questioning the ability or the patriotism of the gentlemen who compose the Committee on Mines, who will go up there if this resolution is passed. Neither am I charging that it will be a partisan investigation, but at a time like this everything that can be done to avoid the suspicion of partisan politics should be done. would be a crime to play politics at the expense of the people of the country.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I would like to inquire whether or not the gentleman is in favor of an investigation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am in favor of the commission that is now in existence, appointed by President Wilson, with full and complete power, getting on a train to-morrow morning, going to Calumet, staying there long enough to find out all the facts, and returning them to this House in decency and in order.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. And the only difference is as to who shall make the investigation?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The difference is more than who shall make the investigation. It is the difference as to the time to be taken to make the investigation. It is the difference as to the effect that the investigation will have upon the country and the acceptability with which the report will be received—free from all party bias, free from the influence of employer or employee. The Industrial Commission is a nonpartisan commission, and its membership is such that it fairly represents both the employer and the employee. It is organized and can go to Michigan or Colorado to-morrow.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state if he knows why the commission has not taken up this question?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am not able to state; but I dare say if the caucus of the Democratic Party would pass a resolution requesting the commission to go to Calumet or Colorado it would go there at once. Or, if this House will pass a resolution directing the Industrial Commission to make an investigation, is there any gentleman here who believes that such a resolution would not be obeyed?

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know whether these men

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They are when working. They receive a per diem.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman think this commission is one that will not act except when instructed by Congress to act?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not know whether they are or They were picked out by your President, and I take it for granted that President Wilson picked them because he was satisfied with their qualifications for that place, and I assume that they will perform their duties. Why they have not taken up this matter lies nearer to your door than to mine, but I am willing to vote now to instruct that commission to go to Calumet and make a thorough investigation.

Mr. HILL. What I want to know is, does the gentleman understand this commission will have to be instructed by Congress before they can act?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No; they can act without instruc-

Mr. HILL. Can the gentleman give any reason why they have not acted?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not know why they have not acted.

Mr. HILL. It is as much the duty of the gentleman as any other individual Member.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes. Mr. COOPER. I recall well the authority conferred upon that commission. It is to investigate a very great number of subjects, and recently I had a conversation with one of the members of the commission and they are endeavoring, as I understood from that conversation, with difficulty, to map out a program embracing a multitude of subjects they are obliged to investigate, and I think for this House to instruct them now would be very inopportune.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I remember, in reading the debate which occurred when the commission bill was passed, that the gentleman from Wisconsin particularly insisted that this commission should and would go into every section of the country and calmly and deliberately find out exactly what causes were at the bottom of labor disturbances and report to the House.

Mr. COOPER. That is very true; but—
Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Why they did not go, I can not tell you; but we can by resolution at least suggest to them that they do go, or by bill compel them to go.

Mr. COOPER. But the gentleman from Michigan misapprehends, I think, or does not thoroughly understand the multitude of things which they have to do.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They do not have to do them all

Mr. COOPER. No; but they have to map out a program that will cover all the industries of the country, the relations of labor, capital, and others things.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It was the understanding at the time this bill was passed that it would relieve the House from these fly-by-night investigations and bring before the House the absolute information upon which it was hoped that remedial legislation could be framed.

Mr. COOPER. It was the understanding of the House that that would be a commission which would conduct investigations in its own way and would not be subject to any instructions from the House of Representatives, and it ought to remain absolutely independent, because if we instruct them to go there now we can next week instruct them to go somewhere else, and we ought not to do it. The personnel of the commission is of the very highest order, and we ought to allow them to carry out their program in their own way.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is the gentleman's view.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There is one other phase of this matter that I desire to discuss briefly before my time expires, but of course I will yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do I understand the gentleman to say he thinks it is necessary for a Federal commission to investigate this matter in Michigan?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Why, Michigan has nothing to conceal. Whether such an investigation is necessary or not, if it is to be had I think the Industrial Commission should conduct it.

nct it. That is what it was created for.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I wish I might have five minutes more.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolution, because of the offensive manner in which it is presented. Now, gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House, in a caucus, instructed the Committee on Rules to report this resolution, as I understand it. Why did you do that? You closed the door of the caucus to every person connected with the State of Michigan, including Members of this body, with the exception of two, who happen to be members of the Democratic Party.

Mr. COX. That was your mistake. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That was our mistake and our State's misfortune. Has the time come when the Federal Government is willing to reach its arm into a State for the purpose of making a Federal investigation without even taking into its confidence the Members of this House from that State? Is it possible that a special investigation into conditions in Mississippi, Alabama, or Georgia may be provided here next week without the Members of the House from those States being given a chance to appear before the body which makes the Michigan has 13 Members of Congress here. determination? Is it possible that the committee which passes upon matters affecting the honor of a State, under this administration, locks the door and makes it impossible for the Republican Members of the House from that State to even present the views of its governor and State officials? Why, we have two Senators-

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; I will yield.

Why did not the gentleman appear before the Rules Committee when this question was being considered? Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Had the disposition of the matter remained with the Rules Committee what I am saying would have no force, because the doors of that committee were open to all. This proposition, however, was disposed of in a Democratic caucus, behind locked doors, and action taken without an opportunity being given to be heard. It is of this I complain.

Mr. KEATING. Without regard to what we did in a Democratic caucus, we did not lock the door of the Rules Committee. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And the Rules Committee was opposed to reporting this resolution.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Michigan was not there.
Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.
Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman know it is a fact that the attorney of the Calumet & Hecla Co. came here and advised with Mr. Emery, the attorney for the National Association of Manufacturers and asked him to average his Association of Manufacturers, and asked him to exercise his influence in this direction?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I have no knowledge whatevernot so much, evidently, as the gentleman from Illinois—about the attorney of the Calumet & Hecla Co.; but I insist as a Member of this House that when a committee has under consideration a resolution affecting my State I have a right to be heard before action is taken.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The attorney up there thought the attrorney for the National Association of Manufacturers preferable or he would have come to you in order to stop this investigation.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; but my time is going pretty fast. I imagine.

Mr. WOODRUFF. You stated you would much prefer this investigation be made by the commission you speak of?
Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would.
Mr. WOODRUFF. Now, if you find it impossible for this commission to make this investigation, will you vote for this resolution?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Why, certainly; but why would it be impossible for the commission to make the investigation? That was what it was created for. Now, then, there is one other matter. Here is a report of 250 pages made by the governor of the State of Michigan upon this whole subject.

An analysis of the governor's report shows that on December 31, 1913, a conference between the governor, attorney general, and labor men was held in Lansing, Mich.

At this conference there were present the governor, Clarence Darrow, John Mitchell, W. D. Mahon, and other labor representatives from the State of Michigan. In this conference the labor leaders complained of the sheriff of Houghton County, the introduction of the so-called gunmen into the district, and stated that the present status of the situation was as follows:

1. That minimum wages paid at the present time in the mines is $2.89, and that the miners would be willing to take that.

2. That the miners would not stand out against the offer of the companies relative to the eight-hour day; the only controversy being as to whether the eight hours should be inclusive or exclusive of the time necessary to go up and down the

3. That the miners would not stand out about the one-man machine proposition.

4. That the only controversy about which both sides refuse to yield is the recognition of the Western Federation of Miners. Mr. Darrow states in this interview that the federation does not ask to be dealt with or contracted with as an organization. He does insist, however, that the men be taken back without giving up their membership in the federation. The companies refuse to yield on this point, and this is the only thing that stands in the way of ending the strike.

The same general view was expressed and the same general position taken by Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Mahan.

The governor's report also shows that on January 6 and 7, 1914, the governor, the attorney general, and the State labor commissioner held hearings in Houghton, and took testimony of labor leaders, strikers, mine owners, circuit judge, sheriff, prosecuting attorney, special prosecutor, representatives of the associated charities of Calumet, and others. There are about 250 pages of this testimony, and it covers the following subjects:

1. The calling of the strike.

The wages paid before the strike began.

3. The wages now paid.

- 4. Treatment of strikers by the gunmen. 5. Eviction of miners from company houses.
- 6. Number of men still out and the number of men in the
- 7. Number of men who have left the district and number who have been brought in since the strike began.

8. Amount of relief furnished by the union to the families of strikers.

9. The demands made by the strikers upon the companies and the difficulties still remaining.

10. The citizens' alliance and how it was organized.

11. The efforts of Mr. Densmore, of the Department of Labor, to bring about a settlement.

12. The disaster at the Italian hall on Christmas Eve and the Mover assault following it.

13. A statement of the situation by representatives of all the mines of the district.

14. The attempt of Judge Murphy, of Detroit, to bring about an adjustment of the strike.

15. The attitude of the companies toward the Western Federation of Miners.

16. Sworn statements of the companies as to the number of men now employed who were employed before the strike.

17. Investigation of the State commissioner of labor of the same subject

18. The attitude of the companies toward labor unions generally.

19. The part that the State militia played and their with-

20. The character of the deputies sworn in since the withdrawal of the troops.

21. The cost of the strike to Houghton County.

22. The relation between the board of supervisors, the judge, and the prosecutor.

23. The feeling of the men who have returned to the mines toward the Western Federation of Miners.

24. The testimony of Judge O'Brien relative to the grand jury. 25. Number of arrests that have been made in the district since the strike began.

26. How many have been tried on strike charges since the strike began?

27. The employment of Mr. Nickols as special prosecutor.

28. A number of miscellaneous matters.

The report covers every phase of the strike situation and contains a full report of the examination of about 50 witnesses. These witnesses represent strikers, mine owners, county officials, and officers of the State; also statements of Mr. Darrow, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Roach, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Mahon, all representing the labor movement. The courtesy of reading it should have at least been accorded it.

Did you have this report before you in the caucus when you authorized the investigation? Did you ask the governor of Michigan for his findings? He had but recently made this personal investigation into the strike territory. Did you absolufely ignore him? Did not you even care to know what he had found in his official capacity?

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. You do not understand that the Democratic caucus ordered the bill passed?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I understand the Democratic caucus ordered the bill to be reported to the House.

Mr. CROSSER. And that does not bind the Members? Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is why I am speaking. If it did I would not be talking at all. Mr. CROSSER. It does not bind the members of the caucus to vote for the resolution, does it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not know what your caucus rules are. But without reference to what the governor of Michigan desired, without asking for a statement from him regarding a most delicate situation-has expired.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the gentleman one minute more. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I say, without knowing how it might complicate a delicate situation, you went ahead and ordered this resolution reported by the Committee on Rules. Had you tried to find a way to humiliate a great Commonwealth, you could not have followed a more direct course.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am sorry that I can not; my time has been extended only one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Now, gentlemen, I want to say this, particularly to those who represent the Southern States, you have problems of your own to work out. May you be given the wisdom and the sympathy and the understanding necessary to work them out to the everlasting glory of two races. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan

has again expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. You of the South have always contended for the dignity of the State and the right to settle your own matters without Federal interference. How, then, can you vote to go into the State of Michigan, without even doing the State the courtesy of asking the governor his views on the matter or without even consulting with the Members of this House from that State?

Even if such action as is proposed here were proper and advisable, it has not been carried forward with due regard to the dignity which a great Commonwealth should be regarded by the Federal Government for the following reasons:

1. Action has been ordered by the Democratic caucus with-out conference or consultation with the Representatives of Michigan in this House.

2. The two United States Senators from Michigan have been given no opportunity to even express their views upon the subject by the Democratic caucus.

3. Although State officials have been in close touch with the strike from the beginning, they have been utterly ignored in this proceeding up to date.

4. Although the governor, attorney general, and State commissioner of labor have, within the past two weeks, made a personal investigation and took upward of 200 pages of testimony, this action has been taken without asking the governor or any other State official to lay before Congress such testimony.

5. No attempt has been made to find out from the governor or other State officials what the situation is in Michigan at the present time, and no more disregard could be shown the State of Michigan if she were entirely without officers or Representatives on the floor of this House.

In conclusion, let us abandon all thought of personal or party advantage and proceed to settle this great labor problem upon the high plane of the country's good. It is worthy of our best endeavor. It is the greatest problem we have had to face since the war. Let us go forward, as we started in a year ago, in a nonpartisan way and gather information by an unbiased commission concerning the entire situation, and then, with that information before us may we have misden to continue the information before us, may we have wisdom to construct the bridge across the gulf between labor and capital, and thus provide the means whereby organized labor, on the one hand, and capital, on the other, may clasp hands in fraternal regard and mutual good will.

Mr. FOSTER, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cullop].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cullop]

is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I hope the resolution just read, requiring an investigation of the conditions existing in the mining districts of Colorado and Michigan, will be passed by no uncertain vote in this House. I have not acquainted myself with the conditions in Colorado, except as I have heard them discussed here, but I have made some examination into the conditions existing in Michigan and find them to be deplorable. I shall read for the benefit of the Members of this House some affidavits of persons who have suffered brutal treatment in that territory and have been deprived of their constitutional rights as citizens of this country. I read as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Houghton, 88:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Houghton, ss:

I. Giovanni Serra, being duly sworn, depose and say that I am a resident of South Range, Adams Township, county of Houghton, and State of Michigan; that on the 14th day of December, at 12.30 p. m., I left South Range for Baltic location in company with my friend Antone Borghi. When we arrived at the point where the Baltic Mining Co. has set its guard of deputy sheriffs and watchmen, one of these deputy sheriffs turns and says to my friend Borghi, "What are you looking at, you ——," and at the same time advancing threatening; my friend Borghi starts to run away and so did I, but in no time the said deputy was on top of me, striking me on the head. I later went to the hospital on account of the wounds inflicted—several deep gashes on the scalp.

I further depose and state that at a very short distance from where the above happened two ladles were eyewitnesses to the above, and they can be called at any time to verify the above statement.

On my oath I further declare that in no way, by act and manner or look, did I provoke the above personal assault.

I, Giovanni Felippi, being duly sworn, depose and say that I reside in the township of Franklin, county of Houghton, and State of Michigan; that on the 15th day of December, 1913, several deputy sheriffs came to my residence, No. 410 Franklin Mine, at about 1.30 p. m., and searched the house for firearms; not finding any, and seeing a trunk which belonged to a boarder of mine gone to Chicago several months ago, they, the said deputy sheriffs, took two axes and broke it open after my telling them to take trunk with them if they did not take my word for the nonownership of said trunk.

STATE OF MICHICAN, County of Houghton, ss:

I. Luigi Landini, being duly sworn, depose and say that I reside in the township of Franklin, county of Houghton, State of Michigan; that I am a small-sized man, weighing about 137; and am by trade a trammer. That on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1913, at about 2.30 o'clock, at the street car station, I heard shooting at the Pewabic street car station; there were about 100 shots fired. When I heard the shots fired I went home, and when I was in front of my house a deputy walking on the street car track fired two shots at me. I started to run, and ran into the house of Oristo Monticelli and went upstairs of his house, badly frightened and scared, and did not know why they were shooting and chasing me. The deputy entered the house and came upstairs and arrested me and put handcuffs on me. While I was under arrest one of the deputies was holding me and the other beating, pounding, and assaulting me on my head and body so that I was black and blue, and had a black eye and still have one. They took me then from the house to the branch office of the sheriff of Houghton County, leading in the citizens' alliance parade, handcuffs on, as far as the said sheriff's branch office. While I was marching with the citizens' alliance parade one fellow by the name of Andro Lucatelli did beat, hit, and assault me with the stock of his revolver, and as a result of that beating, assaulting, and hitting I had large lumps on my head and was bleeding through my mouth and nose. While I stayed in the said branch office of the sheriff of Houghton County the deputies were beating, hitting, and assaulting me until Sheriff Cruse said to them that "He has had enough." At this time I was bleeding profusely through my mouth and nose. This beating was done in the presence of Sheriff Cruse in said office. I have five witnesses to verify the statement made by me—of beating me after being handcuffed and under arrest.

I, John Marco, being duly sworn, depose and say that I reside in the township of Franklin, county of Houghton, State of Michigan; that on the 11th day of December, A. D. 1913, I went to the usual morning strikers' parade and joined the parade at the old Franklin Schoolhouse, which is now used as the temperance hall, and I came with the parade as far as the Franklin store. The mounted soldiers came behind and speeded up to the front of the parade in front of Capt. Kendall's house. They stopped the parade and told the paraders to go back, and the men, women, and children started to go back, and when they did not run fast enough to suit the soldiers and deputies, who then started to shoot in every direction, then the women and men started to run in disorder in all directions. When I was not running fast enough to suit them one William Oxman ran after me and began to beat, hit, and assault me on my head and shoulders with his billy. I asked him what the matter was with him. He answered, "You get out of the county road, miner."

I further depose and say that I saw said William Oxman beating, hitting, and assaulting a Finnish fellow, whose first name is Matti, with his billy, and another man stood behind and was shooting at his side.

I further depose and say that the parade this morning was very peaceful and quiet; nobody uttered or said a word to anybody in the parade or outside of it.

We, the undersigned, being first duly sworn, depose and say that we are residents of Hibbing, Minn.; that on the 7th day of November, 1913, we went to the office of the Standard Employment Co., 621. Tower Avenue, Superior, Wis., and there we asked if we could get a job. The agent told us he would send us to the mines in Michigan, and we then asked if there was a strike on. He told us hat the strike was settled and over. The lowest pay, he told us, was to be $2.60 per day to $3.20. Some slips were handed to us, and we saw the word "strike." Then we objected to going, saying that there was a strike on. The agent then told us that that was an old slip used because they didn't have any other.

We then went to the depot and left about 6.30 p. m. at Superior. We showed the conductor the slips on the train and asked him about it, but he said: "Don't listen to anybody. The strike is over and you fellows will have a good time." Before arriving at Nestoria some one handed us a strike notice, but another fellow came into the coach and destroyed them.

That, before we left Superior the agent called up McNaughton at Calumet and notified him that seven men were coming from Superior, and that he should have two men stationed at a place about 50 miles before destination (Calumet), and that he should guard us and escort us to the mines. There was only one deputy on the train. When we arrived here we saw the parade and knew positively that a strike was on. Mr. Speaker, here is the testimony of eye witnesses, of parties who have been attacked, suffered atrocious and brutal treatment in that unfortunate district, persons who have been denied the protection guaranteed by our laws to every individual living in this great Republic.

This testimony is undisputed. The facts detailed in these affidavits will not be denied or contradicted in this debate. Can we when apprised of such conditions existing in any part of the country shut our eyes and refuse to investigate and permit such conditions unnoticed to continue? For one I am unwilling to do so. This condition has been brought about in this locality because of the conflict between capital and labor. We deplore this fact. We regret that these two important elements of our industrial system can not work together in peace and free from conflict; but if conflicts come and local authorities are unable or refuse to restore peace and harmony, adjust the differences, then it becomes the duty of the Government to interfere, restore peace, maintain order, and secure harmonious relations.

What are the conditions in this great mining region, one of the richest in the world? Martial law exists and the civil authorities are powerless, and the militia is employed to assist the mine owners in tyrannizing over the laborers in that unfortunate section.

The mine owners and operators have employed a foreign corporation engaged in strike breaking to take charge of and control conditions there. This corporation has imported men of the worst character to conduct affairs in those localities. These men are not residents of Michigan, are ineligible under the laws of that State to be appointed deputy sheriffs, and yet the sheriffs' offices of some of the counties have been turned over to these men, and in violation of the law of that State these men have been appointed deputy sheriffs and intrusted with the full power of enforcing the police regulations in those localities. They are in the employ of the mine owners and operators. They select the juries, both grand and petit, and are thereby in full control of the whole law enforcement.

The State militia is likewise turned over to the mine owners and operators, and its movements are directed by them. Could anyone expect a fair trial when his antagonist is empowered to select the jury? Can a person expect protection from an army when his antagonist is in command, with supreme authority to direct every movement? Such a condition I doubt has ever had a parallel in all the conflicts between capital and labor the country has ever known.

Why, if the State of Michigan is protecting the person and property of every individual residing within its borders, should it transfer the enforcement of all its police regulations to a foreign corporation in the employ of one of the parties engaged in this conflict? Why, if the State of Michigan is ready and willing to uphold the peace, dignity, and order of that great State, should it turn over to one of the parties engaged in a serious conflict its militia, armed and equipped for battle, and permit that party to use it for private benefit and tyrannize over its antagonist? Is not the right of one party as sacred in the eyes of that State as another? Why should all authority vested in the constabulary of that State be turned over to a foreign corporation employed by one of the parties engaged in a bitter contest now being waged there—a corporation which has imported men and clothed them with full power of executing its laws, selecting and empaneling all juries, and selecting the forums in which trials are conducted? Is this the fair and impartial and unfettered administration of justice guaranteed to every individual living in this great country, with all its boasted liberties? I hope not.

The State, we hope, is able to maintain order within its boundaries. It ought to be able to do so, but it is not doing so. Disorder and violence rage there and will so long as the State of Michigan permits and tolerates such conditions in handling this unfortunate condition of affairs.

It is an abuse of both the civil and military authority and re quires Federal supervision. In the conflict going on there its civil and military authorities both should act with fairness and guarantee to both parties every right vouchsafed them under the Constitution. They are not doing so, and because of this fact the Federal Congress has a right to interfere and see that every citizen of high or low degree, it matters not, is fully protected in all his rights and these impositions stopped. We are told by the opponents of this resolution that this House has no power to act. I deny it, and on the contrary assert it is fully empowered to act. Let me remind those who advance this contention that the National House of Representatives is the source and origin of power in this Republic, under proper and welldefined limitations, and the action here proposed is within the well-defined limitations.

It is constantly creating new powers and executing them. If it could not, as the evolution of the times developed new conditions it would be a helpless Government and powerless to meet and cope with the new conditions which arise almost daily. Such a contention urged by the opponents of this resolution is futile and only demonstrates the desperate straits to which they are reduced in attempting to sustain their unwarranted position.

If no such power for acting in this matter exists, then a sufficient answer is that now is the proper time and occasion to create such power and employ it in this instance, because conditions now existing in this case imperatively demand it and, further, because such conditions are intolerable in a free country like ours. Of this we should make an example.

It is further insisted by the opponents of this resolution that all the good that can come from this investigation if ordered and made is publicity. I can assure all such who urge that as an argument that that is sufficient.

Publicity is a sure and safe remedy for many evils, and especially for the one existing here. Turn on the searchlight of publicity and let the whole country know of the wrongs imposed, the high-handed, arbitrary methods and abuse of both the civil and military power, the atrocities and injuries inflicted on unoffending people and the brutal treatment administered without rhyme or reason, and an indignant but fair-minded and justice-loving public will visit upon these self-constituted administrators of civil and military authority their righteous but wrathy indignation and compel them to surrender back to the public their illegal usurpation of power so arbitrarily exercised by them. The people of this country will arraign them at the bar of public opinion and administer to them the punishment they so richly deserve.

Publicity will compel them to cease their indefensible conduct and compel them to desist from their inhuman treatment of these unfortunate employees.

Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, all differences in the Michigan mining region between the employers and employees were satisfactorily adjusted and the men were ready to go to work, and would have done so, had it not been for the unreasonable requirements of the employers, who demanded that before any employee should return to work he must withdraw from the labor union with which he was affiliated, and this alone is the only contention between them. The laboring men refused to do this, and for this they are rather to be commended than condemned.

That requirement is unjust and unreasonable, and the public so regard it. These employers of labor have just as much right | to dictate what and when their employees shall eat and wear, what church they shall attend, or what political party they shall belong to, what kind of houses they shall live in. Such a proposition is preposterous and should be condemned.

This is a free country, and the right of the individual to exercise his free will must forever remain inviolate. If this demand were tolerated, that right would be destroyed and the liberty of the citizen surrendered. We can not uphold such conduct, but should denounce it as inimical to the welfare of the individual and the preservation of his independence. Upon it the seal of public condemnation is irrevocably fixed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we all deplore every conflict which arises between capital and labor-every controversy which arises between these two essential elements of our industrial operations. It is not alone the parties engaged in such controversies which suffer, but the whole public is materially affected and it interrupts the general public welfare. Duty requires that these troubles be adjusted in the interests of the common welfare, in order that public security may prevail and the rights of all be

The humble employee is as much entitled to our consideration as the rich and powerful employer. Their places before the law are equal, and their rights to common equality assured. Let us do our duty in this matter, and see that these rights are secured and that justice is accorded to all; that the wrongdoer shall suffer the consequences of his ill-advised course. No one should desire more and none should be satisfied with less

These men have been imposed upon by these powerful employers and appeal to us for the protection of their rights, for the security of their persons and property, which, though small in value, is dear to them, and they hope we will respond to their appeal with the answer that: Your persons and property shall be protected from every hostile invasion, and your rights will be preserved as securely as those of the richest and most powerful in all the land.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMIL-TON] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HAMIL/TON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, in so far as it relates to Michigan, had its inception in a resolution offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mac-DONALD], which a Democratic caucus directed the Democratic members of the Rules Committee to report to the House.

To assume that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Mac-DONALD] is not profoundly convinced of the truth of the charges he has made would be to assume that he is capable of doing an unpatriotic thing for an ignoble purpose.

I assume, therefore, that he has in his possession evidence which has convinced him, and which he believes will convince the committee, provided for in this resolution, that a condition of peonage exists in the State of Michigan; that the Federal mail facilities are being obstructed in the Upper Peninsula of the State of Michigan; and that the courts of Michigan are so corrupt and so derelict in the performance of their duty that life and property are no longer safe in Michigan; and that citizens are being arrested, tried, and convicted without warrant of law and in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

It was Michigan, Mr. Speaker, that gave to jurisprudence such names as Cooley, Christiancy, Campbell, and Graves.

It was the courts of Michigan that Bryce, in his American Commonwealth, placed with the courts of Massachusetts highest amongst the courts of the States of the Union. And. sir, down to this time no man has ever dared to say that the judges, both State and Federal, of the State of Michigan are not worthy successors of the illustrious men who have preceded them upon the bench. [Applause.]

I can not but hope, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] has been in some way misin-

I am not permitted to doubt his sincerity, because it is not conceivable that a Member of this House, acting under the obligation of his oath, would bring charges against the good name and the fair fame of his State of the truth of which he is not profoundly convinced.

Moved by his allegations the Committee on Rules has re-ported this resolution, which provides a tribunal to hear, try, and determine these charges.

I shall vote for it because I want to see my State vindicated. I shall vote for it because if I do not some man may say I meant to cover up some unclean thing in Michigan and suppress information.

I shall vote for it in the confident belief that the good name of my State will be triumphantly vindicated.

And if it shall appear that these charges are a baseless fabrication imposed upon the credulity of the gentleman from Michigan, I shall expect him at some future time to rise in his place here and admit that he was misinformed.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the charges to which my colleague from Michigan has just referred have not only been brought to this House with the high indorsement of the Member representing that district of Michigan in this House, but they, and charges worse, have been carried through the news agencies all over this land; and I submit that it appears under this administration of affairs in this Government of ours that there seems to be no other tribunal where the State of Michigan can have its cause tried except before a subcommittee of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House. Under this administration of Democracy we have, as my colleague [Mr. Kelley of Michigan] has said, seen a law lie dormant that would have provided a fair, unprejudiced investigation of this matter. Further, there has been an investigation made by a department of the Government, but I, as one of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Michigan, have been unable even to have a glimpse at the report of the Department of Labor.

After argument I got a copy of the summary that was given to the newspapers, but even yet I have not had a look at the full report, which reposes somewhere in the Senate end of the Capitol. Hence, the question is not what kind of an investigation we should have but what kind of an investigation can we have; and that question is not decided here on this floor but behind the closed doors of the Democratic caucus. Hence, I am forced to vote for the only kind of a proposition under which the cause of the governor of Michigan and our people may be tried. It involves the good name of my State. It involves the interests of large concerns in that State. volves, more important than any of these things, the daily welfare of many humble men, women, and children in my State; and although I do not feel that this is the best kind of procedure, I am forced to vote for this resolution. I do not look upon the resolution as a verdict and I do not wish my vote to be taken as an indorsement of the truth of these charges, but I am voting for it simply in order that publicity may come and that the truth may be investigated; and instead of being a verdict, this resolution is a commission to take testimony. trust that, now the Democracy have made a partisan question of this particular industrial issue by taking it behind the closed doors of the Democratic caucus, they will make good under the high and important responsibility they have assumed. I have the highest confidence in the chairman of that committee, and trust that the investigation may justify our confidence.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado

[Mr. KINDEL]

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to say, for the purpose of showing you that I am not averse to investi-gations, that I was one of four of the primary witnesses whose testimony brought about the investigation of the Steel Trust .If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] some years ago. were here, no doubt he would indorse my statement as to that fact.

I have nothing in common with the men who are the owners of the mines, though I am a manufacturer. I do not own a dollar's worth of their stock nor do I sell them my manufactured goods. I owe them nothing, and look for nothing from them. I firmly believe there would be no investigation called for by the Western Federation of Miners and the politicians who are here turning blood into politics if the mine owners would accede to the demands of the union in the way of unionizing all their forces.

I was out in Colorado in November to investigate, and on Thanksgiving Day I went over the several coal camps in southern Colorado, and, to say the least, it was a horrible condition of affairs. One of my experiences was this: I heard that the troops that are now in the field to maintain law and order had incarcerated a German who was one of the troublesome agitators and that they would not give him a chance to be seen or heard by anybody. As a Congressman, I resolved to see him and that nobody should accompany me, that I should be allowed to investigate this man by myself, unattended. This was granted me by the jailer and the military force. This man's name was Robert Uhlich. He told me his address was box 387, Trinidad, Colo.; had been in this country since 1907; a German I asked Mr. Uhlich why he was incarcerated, and he said that he did not know, except that he was an agitator and an organizer of labor.

In my memorandum book he inserted that he was the international organizer and vice president of the Colorado State Federation of Labor, also president of Trinidad Miners' Union, also a board member of District 15, United Mine Workers, also an organizer of American Federation of Labor; was 31 years old; not married; and not a coal miner but a molder by trade, which trade he had not followed for the past four years. I noticed he had soft, piano-playing hands. I said, "Since you are not a coal miner, and you have not worked at the molder trade for some years, how do you subsist; what brings you here?" He said, "I have been an organizer." I said, "What does that bring you?" He replied, "Four dollars a day," and that he had been engaged in that business for the past four years; that he had no family; and that he was not a citizen of the United States, only having taken out his first papers. I replied, "Since you are an alien, I, as a Congressman, can not longer interest myself in your case; but I will call upon the German consult to help you out." He said, "Oh, no; don't do that." I said, "Why not?" He said, "I am a deserter from the German army." [Laughter.]

I said—well, I guess I will not repeat the language that I used to him, and left him in disgust.

All that is demanded by the strikers in Colorado is acknowledgment of the union. They want simply that the mine owners shall see to it that every miner is a union man. If not, he shall immediately pay $10 initiation fee and $1 per month dues, and if any fines of the union are assessed against a man that they shall be taken out of the man's wages by the mine owners, and on the first of each month paid to the collector or treasurer of the union.

It is not a question of wage in Colorado. The mine owners in southern Colorado are paying 20 per cent higher wages than in Oklahoma or Kansas, the adjoining States.

While in Colorado I offered my services to assist Mr. Wilson, the Secretary of Labor, and Mr. Ammons, governor of Colorado, who were endeavoring to bring about conciliation between miners and mine owners, but our efforts have proved futile.

Before I went to Colorado I received the following telegram: PUEBLO, COLO., October 17, 1913.

Hon. George J. Kindel, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

Carpenters' Union No. 362 requests you to use your influence to obtain, if possible, a congressional investigation of the coal strike in southern Colorado. T. A. ASHER, Recording Secretary.

On receipt of this telegram I answered at once, "I am heartily in favor of investigation. Will act accordingly."

After I visited Colorado and saw the conditions, I came to the conclusion that this subject matter should be investigated by our Industrial Commission and Secretary of Labor, and even if investigation is had that the Western Federation of Miners and agitators like this man Robert Uhlich, Louis Tikas, alias Greek Pete, Mother Jones, Ford Cornwall, saloon keeper, should be inquired into as well as get the fullest particulars of the mine owners' affairs.

I have received many telegrams urging investigation from both strikers and mine owners. I quote the following telegrams to substantiate what I have said:

Falkstone Court, Washington, D. C.:

My attention is called to statements reported to have been made by Keating yesterday before Rules Committee, in which he grossly misrepsented facts relative to strike situation. I trust you will not permit the committee to be misled by such irresponsible and self-serving assertions. If upon the facts as they really exist an investigation is deemed helpful, only fair-minded and wholly impartial men should be named on committee. To such men we will gladly submit all information within our power. our power.

Congressman George J. Kindel, Washington, D. C.:

Washington, D. C.:

In connection with proposed investigation of Colorado coal strike, it should be remembered that Gov. Ammons arranged for and presided at a conference between three striking miners and coal operators. The result of which convinced him that there were no material differences between miners and operators to justify continuance of strike, and that he suggested a basis on which the strike should be terminated, which suggestion was accepted by the operators as a result of the governor's recommendations, and is accepted by operators and the movement of coal miners from the East to Colorado, where earnings are much higher than in districts in which they are now working. The mines are rapidly increasing their output, and from now on can supply all demands for Colorado coal.

Here is one of a number intended to intimidate:

GEORGE KINDEL, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

Bitterly disappointed to hear you are opposing Keating investigation. You are taking side of organized robbers against the humble citizens of Colorado who trusted you once but will trust you no longer unless you show a change of heart.

I have also received the following resolution, among many others:

[Local Union No. 3003, United Mine Workers of America, located at Rugby, Colo., Las Animas County.]

JANUARY 7, 1914.

To the honorable the President and Congress of the United States of America:

Whereas thousands of miners in the copper regions of Michigan as well as in other parts of the United States have been for months engaged in a terrific struggle with the mine owners; and Whereas in this struggle the workers have encountered atrocity and outrage, have seen their members murdered, their property destroyed, their homes ravaged, their children killed, the editors and publishers of their papers arrested, thrown into jall, and refused release on ball; their leaders shot, violently assaulted, dragged through the streets of the city, and driven out of the State; and Whereas in all the copper region all semblance of right and justice is suspended, a reign of violence and terrorism prevails, while labor and industry are paralyzed; and Whereas these events demonstrate conclusively the utter incapacity of the present mine owners to operate the mines of these regions either in justice to labor or in safety to the communities or in harmony with the welfare of the people of this Nation: Therefore be it Resolved, That the undersigned hereby demand of the Congress of

with the weithre of the people of this Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the undersigned hereby demand of the Congress of the United States to take steps as follows:

First. That a thorough congressional investigation of the whole strike situation be made immediately, and the findings be published at the earliest possible moment.

Second. That the Government take immediate steps to acquire possession of the copper mines and operate them under union conditions.

Passed by 316 union miners of Local Union No. 3003, United Mine Workers of America.

Parley Potter, President.

PARLEY POTTER, President. THOMAS SHERRATT, Secretary.

I sent this resolution to Joseph W. Selden, vice president of the First National Bank of Calumet, for explanation, and he replied as follows:

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CALUMET, Calumet, Mich., January 12, 1914.

Hon. George J. Kindel.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: I have your letter of January 10, inclosing sample of the resolutions being adopted by the local unions of the United Mine Workers of America. The sole trouble with these resolutions is that there is not a single allegation which is true. No member of the Western Federation has been murdered; their property has not been destroyed; they have no newspapers published in this country; their leaders have not been shot nor their children killed except by the carelessness of the members of their own union. Up to six months ago we had in the copper district of Michigan an ideal mining community. Everybody was satisfied, money was plentiful, the miners having over $11,000,000 in the local savings banks, and all this has been changed by the machinations of the Moyer-Mahoney outfit.

I am pleased to see that you understand. I am returning herewith the original resolution after having made a copy of it for my own use.

Thanking you again, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

Jos. W. Selden.

I sent a copy of this letter to the signers of the resolution above quoted, and asked them to explain why this discrepancy of facts, to which I have received the following reply. I publish this letter for the edification of the investigating committee:

United Mine Workers of America, Local Union No. 3003, Rapson, Las Animas County, Colo., February 2, 1914.

Rapson, Las Animas County, Colo., February 2, 1914.

Hon. George J. Kindel.,

Member House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: In answer to your kind reply of January 19 to the resolution passed by this body in regard to the copper strike in Michigan and coal miners in this State, we desire to express our heartfelt thanks to you and the rest of our Congressmen for your kindly interest in the affairs of our State and the miners' cause in particular.

In so far as Mr. Joseph W. Selden's reply to our resolutions, saying they are all untrue, will kindly ask, what was done to Mr. Moyer? What was done to the women and children on Christmas eve. There have been many other atrocities committed respecting which we have no exact data right now on hand, but we feel that this investigating committee, which will soon be on the ground, will be given all the assistance required by the miners, and, whatever the outcome, the facts by all means should be published to the world. If the operators would settle with their people this bitter fight would soon be ended. A man who goes down into the earth and risks life and limb from the moment he steps on the cage should receive more wages and better consideration than men who are in the open air. The miners' side of the story has never been believed. That is the main reason we court this investigation.

Now a word in our own behalf. We feel there has not and is not nam men who are in the open air. The limiter's side of the story has never been believed. That is the main reason we court this investigation.

Now, a word in our own behalf. We feel there has not and is not now any necessity for the troops to be here, as they afford the miners no protection, nor do we want any. They are here, and, whether intended or not, they, or at least many of them, are using their uniform to get all kinds of unfair labor, thinking to fill the mines with any kind of men, many of whom have been fooled into Colorado by false promises, mostly inexperienced men, who don't know what dangers they are in. Many of the mines are very gassy, and a man of no knowledge of the business is very likely to blow up a mine and not only kill himself, but many others. They are in many instances the lowest kind of people and not fit to become citizens of this or any other community. People are annoyed in going to and from the post office. Strikers' floors torn up, trunks and bureaus ransacked time and again, in search for firearms, and many other outrages are committed by drunken soldiers, and when the governor is informed of these things he declares it is unbelievable, as the militiamen are recruited from the best families of Colorado. There are so many charges that I can not begin to write anything like all of them. The investigating committee will be able to find out many of these things, and we think and believe they will be proved.

Some of the reasons we are on strike are that we want to be paid for 2,000 pounds for a ton, instead of from 3,000 to 3,800. Unless we get a contract there is no way under the sun that we can get our dues. This we can and will prove to the satisfaction of everybody concerned. Yours, truly,

PARLEY POTTER, President,
THOMAS SHERRATT, Secretary,
Local Union 3003, U. M. W. of A., Rugby, Colo.

The deplorable fact is that men of the stripe of Uhlich, above mentioned, and women like "Mother Jones," holding the sentiment that they express, reflect discredit on any organization with which they are connected. They know no flag, no country, and no law.

Now that Congress has overwhelmingly decided to investigate, I trust that there will be no repetition of my colleague's Mr. Keating] action, who sent a telegram to Denver stating that I was bitterly opposed to any investigation. His only excuse to me for sending such a boomerang message was that he intended that the telegram should be confidential.

Here is what it resulted in. I quote from a Denver newspaper account of a labor meeting:

At this juncture of the proceedings a telegram from Congressman Edward Keating was read. It stated that one of the reasons the resolution calling for a congressional investigation of the coal strike was being held up was because Congressman George J. Kindel was bitterly opposing it. Keating asked if the convention could not bring some pressure to bear to swing Kindel into line.

Mother Jones sprang to her feet on the rostrum and shouted:

"Yes; we can. Don't resolute; just send George Kindel a telegram and say in it, 'If you don't vote for that resolution, don't come home, for every miner in Colorado will be waiting at the train for you with a rope.' That'll get him or the rope will."

In his argument for investigation my colleague Mr Keating.

In his argument for investigation my colleague, Mr. Kfating, never once mentioned the seventy-odd murders which had been committed, the railroad bridges and other property destroyed in Colorado; all this omitted for the purpose of "turning blood into politics," thinking thereby, no doubt, to enhance his chances for reelection by gaining the labor vote to reelect him.

I fully concur in the sentiments of the chairman of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], also those of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kelley], none of whom are averse to investigation, and I believe as they do, that Congress should not do this investigating while there are other bodies properly constituted for that purpose.

No fair and honest man can have any objection to mechanics of any class organizing for their mutual protection and betterment. It is the professional agitators, dynamiters, and cutthroats, who never work nor let anyone else work unless they can dictate the terms and who are themselves sustained by the treasury of the union that are objected to by self-respecting employees and employers of these United States. Neither have I respect for nor patience with the oppressive and cowardly employer who takes advantage of labor just because he is in a position to do so. It is the mean and overbearing bosses that produce mean labor unions and between them the country at large is made to suffer.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is very well known-certainly on this side of the House-that I was opposed to this resolution; and inasmuch as I intend to vote against it now, it is only fair that I should state briefly the reasons that move me to do so.

This is not a new question to the Committee on Rules. Shortly after my service on that committee began the proposition was presented to us for the first time, so far as I know, of projecting a legislative branch of the Federal Government into an investigation of industrial troubles in a State. The committee went very thoroughly into the matter at that time, and some of us at least examined with great detail the question of the power of the legislative branch to make such an investigation. We became convinced that it had not the power to do so. It was presented subsequently in several different resolutions, and finally in the resolutions of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

When this matter came before the committee in the Colorado case, because of the great pressure, because of the evident anxiety and the apparent deep interest in the matter by so many persons, I, for one member of the committee, undertook to and did reexamine the legal questions that were involved in order to determine whether or not I had been mistaken in my early impressions as to the matter of power. Much to my regret, because of the sympathy I had in this case, I was confirmed in my first legal impressions concerning it.

Mr. Speaker, this House, in my judgment, can investigate for only three purposes, roughly speaking. One is for the purpose of impeachment, another is for the purpose of examining the conduct of its own Members with a view to preserving its legislative integrity and punishing its Members for disorderly conduct; and, third, for the purpose of ascertaining facts essential to be determined in order to legislate. I assert, sir, that neither of these propositions is involved in the remotest degree in this resolution, and the clauses thrown in here in regard to violation of peonage laws and interference with the mails are nothing more or less than to create a subterfuge to the end that this House may raise a committee to be used as a vehicle for publicity.

Reduced to its elements, the argument of every gentleman who appeared before the Committee on Rules, the argument of every gentleman in the caucus, the argument of every gentleman here is that we shall do this, whether we have the power or not, because it will erect a vehicle for publicity.

Another thing Democrats especially should remember is that, so far as the Michigan case is concerned, there was practically no demand from any source for an investigation, except such as was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MacDonald], until within two days of the meeting of the Democratic caucus. Paying no attention to the pleading of the members of a committee who had investigated the matter and considered it from all angles, a Democratic caucus was swept fron its feet, and, over the protest of the only Democratic governor which the State of Michigan has had for 50 years, perhaps the only Democratic governor it has ever had—I am not sure—a governor who is "making good," according to all the testimony, is about to drive this House into the investigation of a condition that is thrilling with politics.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. You are about to send a committee of Congress into a sovereign State to do a thing which that committee has no power to do over the protest, if I am correctly informed, of that State's highest official, who is himself handling well a delicate situation. Mr. Speaker, I think this House should not lend itself to the demand to create a vehicle for publicity. I assert without hesitation that the West Virginia investigation by the Senate of the United States, in all is essential elements, was a farce and accomplished nothing. The Senate committee has made no report, no legislation has resulted from it, and no impeachment will be had.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I will give the gentleman more time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Two minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well; I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have about concluded what I desired to say. I have, of course, as have all men who have hearts, a sympathy with the struggling people in those sections; but, sir, we will better serve in the ultimate end the people of this Republic by preserving not only the form but the substance of the law. I tell you, sir, that the time will come when such investigations as this will be proven to be farcical. What will this committee do, forsooth, if, when it arrives in Colorado or in Michigan, some witness summoned before it declines to answer a question? It will stand powerless to act, because this resolution exceeds the authority of the House, and when it reports back here the name of some witness for contempt this House will be powerless to act, and the courts will release him on a writ of habeas corpus in a moment, because the House is attempting to exceed its power. Read the Kilbourn case-

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee

has again expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree with the sentiments just expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett], because I believe public opinion—a correct public opinion founded upon facts—is the most powerful force in this country to-day, and when we have such public opinion correctly founded upon facts the House of Representatives, the Senate, capital, and labor organizations themselves must bow to that public opinion. I was surprised to hear the gentleman say that, in his opinion, the investigation of the strike in West Virginia had no effect in the settlement of that strike. On the contrary, the public everywhere in this country is of the belief that publicity in connection with that investigation caused the settlement of that strike.

caused the settlement of that strike.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman misunderstood me. I did not mean to say it had no effect on the settlement of the strike; at least, I did not say that. However, I do not know that I would object very much to saying it.

Of the country may be properly preserved.

It is claimed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garnett] that the investigation of the strike in Paint and Cabin Creek districts, in West Virginia, by the Senate was a farce and resulted in no good. I desire to inform the gentleman that

Mr. LENROOT. That then being granted, if a resolution can be framed such as this resolution, based upon powers that the House of Representatives has a right to exercise, if as a result of the publicity it can bring relief to the situation in Colorado and to the situation in Michigan, then I am in favor of it and every other Member of this House ought to be in favor of it also.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield, because I have only five minutes. Mr. Speaker, I can not share in the condemnation of the Democratic caucus upon this proposition. I have criticized you gentlemen for your caucus action as often as any Member in the House, but, Mr. Speaker, there should be a distinction made between a Democratic caucus which compels legislation to be brought upon the floor of this House without binding Members as to how they shall vote upon it, and caucus legisla-tion which attempts to legislate in caucus and bind the members of the Democratic caucus. What is this situation?

The Democratic majority of the Committee on Rules refused.

to report out this resolution, and the Democratic caucus compelled them to do so, without attempting to bind any of you as to how you should vote upon the resolution itself; and if in the future you will limit your caucus action to giving the House an opportunity to vote, free and untrammeled, on any question, then you will never find me rising in my place and criticizing you for such action.

Just one other thing, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate, in my judgment, that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kelley], who spoke a short time ago, who desires to offer an amendment to this resolution, did not himself object to the request for unanimous consent that the previous question should be considered as ordered. If I had known—if the Members of this House had known—that the gentleman from Michigan desired to offer such an amendment, I should have been glad to join him in objecting to the request that the previous question should be considered as ordered. But he himself did not object, and we are now put in the position of choosing this resolution as it stands or voting it down. Being put in that position, I am in favor of the resolution as it stands.

I yield back the remainder of my time.
Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Fowler].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, there are two great factors in business in this world. One is capital and the other is labor. Capital in America, as well as in other countries, claims the right to organize, and has proceeded to organize until it controls the business of the country. Capital, on the other hand, claims that labor has no right under the law to organize; but labor, under its constitutional rights, claims that it has the same right to organize that capital has; and so labor has organized to relieve the toiling masses of this country.

Capital has always discouraged the organization of labor in every way possible. Union men are turned away and refused employment solely because they are members of the union. This fight is still going on, and that is one of the reasons which underlies the trouble in these two mining districts. The mine owners in Michigan refuse to allow laboring men to return to their work until they renounce the union. In my judgment the conditions are of such a dangerous character as to justify an investigation, so that Congress may know where the wrong lies and be able to provide a remedy against such evils.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee contends that Congress does not have the power to investigate industrial disputes, even where the trouble is grave, as is the case now in the coal fields of Colorado and the copper districts of Michigan. I deny that proposition. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have the power to provide for "the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

To be able to do this Congress must be properly informed as to the state of the Union. One of the channels for securing such information is through an investigation. It is idle to talk about casting upon Congress a great responsibility like this and then deny to it the power to collect such information as is necessary to an intelligent discharge of such duty. If the "general welfare" of this country or any part thereof is threatened with danger, it is not only the province of Congress to investigate the conditions which brought about such danger, but it is its duty to do so in order that the "general welfare" a reign of terror prevailed in these districts until the Senate commenced its investigation. Civil government had been suspended and military rule had taken its place. Men were imprisoned without cause and tried for misdemeanors by a courtmartial, and sentenced to prison for a term of years. Laboring men were corralled by armed agents of the coal operators, prevented from going to the post office for mail, and in several instances they were killed. It was this investigation, and this investigation alone, which restored order.

The conditions in Colorado and Michigan are reported to be as appalling now as were the conditions in West Virginia a year Just how long they will continue no one knows; but I predict that as soon as the Committee on Mines and Mining begins to investigate we will see a change in conditions in these mining districts. It will act like a dose of soothing sirup. It is said that the governors of these States have tried to bring about peace, but that they have failed. It is said that the Secretary of Labor has visited the scene of trouble in an effort to restore order, but that the powers of his department are not broad enough to reach the case. It is said that the industrial commission has power to investigate these troubles, but it has apparently paid no attention to the matter. Such failures furnish the strongest reasons for action by Congress. Clothed with power unlimited to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the country, Congress seems to be the only forum which is able to give complete relief.

Mr. Speaker, a delay of legislative bodies to respond in wise laws for the wholesome regulation of obnoxious conditions is what has brought about in the past much opposition to government and to those in authority. King George's failure to comply with the wishes of the Colonies led to the American Revolution. A failure to recognize the rights of American commerce on the high seas led to the War of 1812. ure to recognize our territorial rights led to the War with Mex-A failure to abolish African slavery led to the Civil War. A failure of capital to recognize the rights of labor led to the organization of labor unions. The failure of Government to regulate the conduct of monopolies and trusts in dealing with the rights of labor to have reasonable hours per day and liberal wages, gave birth to the strike; and failure of Congress to respond to public opinion in settling strikes in the interest of the public welfare will breed discontent and lead to the overthrow of the party in power, whatever its name may be.

If we would save this country from revolution in the future, it will be well for us to solve, wisely and speedily, the problem of trust control of business and capital domination in politics in America. The streets of Paris ran with blood because the Government of France failed to listen to the petitions of her people. This world was not made for the few, but it was made for the many, and the many are determined to and will possess it. Governments had just as well recognize this right and provide by liberal laws for a speedy and easy method of solving the question. The right of the people to own and rule this world is a God-given right, and they are determined to enter into their own as the children of Israel entered into the promised land.

Mr. Speaker, let us do our duty bravely, so that relief may be given to that great army of men whose labor supplies the world with food, raiment, and shelter. They are struggling for an equality of human rights and for human existence. We owe a duty to them to provide for their general welfare; for the general welfare of the country is the general welfare of the people. Our forefathers suffered human slavery to grow up with our institutions. The first draft of the Declaration of Independence contained a clause against slavery. Had this clause been permitted to stand as Jefferson wrote it, there would have been no Civil War. We have a system of industrial bondage now, more threatening to the welfare of this Republic than chattel slavery was during the constructive period of our Government. Should we neglect our duty and fail to provide against its con-Who can say that we will not have another civil war. The omission of duty sometimes proves to be more destructive than the commission of wrongs. Then let us leave no room for future criticism. If it takes a new clause in the Declaration of Independence to solve this problem, let us write it now. The passage of this resolution is the first step to be taken, and when the committee makes its report we will have valuable evidence, I trust, which will aid in the further discharge of our duty. As Moses led the children of Israel out from under their Egyptian taskmasters, let Congress lead labor out from under the bondage of our industrial taskmasters.

Now, capital throughout the country has opposed the efforts of labor to organize, and that is what brought on the great fight in Michigan and Colorado to-day. The operators of the mines in both of these States have imported into these strike districts disreputable men and have succeeded in having them clothed with authority as deputy sheriffs and constables to do their bidding. Civil government has been suspended and the law of force and brutality has been substituted in its place. Innocent men have been cast in prison and the labor quarters have been terrorized and outraged by military tactics, the same as was recently carried on in Paint and Cabin Creek districts, in West Virginia. Such charges have been made in the columns of the daily press for months, and if they are true they should be investigated.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, it is claimed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] that Congress has no authority to order an investigation of these industrial troubles. I deny that proposition. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hill].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable argument pro and con upon this resolution to-day. I desire to refer first to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett], who is a member of the Rules Committee, as such, opposed sending this resolution to the floor of this House. I do not intend to attack his integrity or sincerity in opposing this resolution. I think he is actuated in his opposition to it with the same sincerity and honesty of purpose that actuate those of us who heartily favor the adoption of this resolution at this time.

He honestly thinks and believes this resolution should not be adopted by this House. We honestly think and believe it should be adopted. Many honest men are wrong at times. He is honestly wrong, and we are honestly right.

In general, his argument is that this House has the power to make investigations for only these purposes, namely, to investigate for the purpose of impeachment, to investigate the right of Members to their seats in this House, and to investigate to ascertain facts upon which to base legislation. Granting that his position is correct, the latter proposition laid down by him is one of wide latitude and, as I believe, comes within the purview and purpose of this resolution. One of the constutional guaranties is "to promote the general welfare" of the citizens of this Republic. The purpose of this investigation is to promote the general welfare of at least some of the citizens of our country.

It is said that the Senate investigation in West Virginia was a farce, and that we are now proceeding to enact another farce comedy by Congress. I do not know how others may feel about it, but, as for me, I would say that it is much better for Congress to enact a few such farce comedies than to continue to have so many tragedies enacted in the poor men's homes of this country. While I do not admit it, yet if by narrow, strict, and technical construction you can say that Congress has ne power to make such an investigation, I desire to admonish you that it was by just such construction that our Nation was engulfed in civil war. It was this narrow, technical construction of the fundamental principles upon which our Republic rests that led to this, the bloodlest conflict in American history.

The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the

The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States are ever-living instruments, sufficient in scope, when properly construed, to meet all such issues as this. If they are not, for God's sake and the sake of humanity, let us make them so.

The approach to labor legislation in Congress has been made with much fear and trembling. I remember in the closing days of the last session of the Sixty-second Congress, when the sundry civil bill was before the House, Uncle Joe Cannon, in speaking upon the bill, said, in substance, if he were President of the United States he would veto the bill because labor unions were exempted from the rôle of "combinations in restraint of trade." The bill was passed exempting labor unions as combinations in restraint of trade. President Taft heard the keynote warning of Uncle Joe and the bill was vetoed, assigning therefor the reason mentioned by Mr. Cannon.

Mr. Speaker, I claim, and think I can easily show, that labor unions are not combinations in restraint of trade. First, I desire to say that on account of the existence of labor unions laboring men are receiving better wages than they could have ever hoped to secure without organization.

The affiliated locals for each mine, workshop, or factory, where the members meet, serve as the only school the workingman can or has the pleasure of attending. It is in these local organizations that they meet and discuss their trade or labors. It becomes a school for them. It is here, by process of exchanging ideas, that they become better, more efficient workmen, and on account of their increased efficiency they merit higher pay and better wages. For this reason they do more work, earn more profit for their employers, and do meritoriously demand and receive higher wages from time to time.

In addition to the increase in their efficiency they study sanitary and safety conditions. Until labor organized you did not see on our statutes laws securing better ventilation of mines, factories, and working places; you did not see laws providing for safety appliances; you did not see laws requiring proper sanitation; you did not see liability laws; you did not see an eight-hour law to better insure the workingman's health and physical condition.

These and many other wholesome laws have been placed on our statutes because labor is organized.

Mr. Speaker, no one on the floor of this House will attempt to gainsay that any institution among mankind that will raise the standard of intelligence and the standard of efficiency of any class of people is beneficial to all mankind.

In addition to the benefits of organized labor, which I have just now mentioned, I want to say that without the beneficent influences of the labor organizations common mankind to-day would not enjoy the benign and useful influences of the lives of would not eally the beingst and the such men as Samuel Gompers, John W. Mitchell, and many others that time now forbids me to here mention. Their lives others that time now forbids me to here mention. Their lives have been given and consecrated to the cause of laboring humanity at the expense of public honor and positions of wealth and influence which they have gratuitously declined for the sake of struggling mankind.

Mr. Speaker, when the roll call of the tablet of memory of those who spent their lives in usefulness for mankind in reached you will find the names of these men at or near the top of the list.

I lay it down as a rule that every injury is the concern of all. It is said by some here that it is the purpose of organized labor, through this congressional investigation, to force the employers in Colorado and Michigan to recognize union labor. hope and pray it does have that result. No one can deny but that these strikes are injuring some one there. If they are, we are concerned and the whole country is concerned. If these investigations result in stopping the injury by permitting the workers to organize, the country all over will be the beneficiary of the relief.

To operate a mine or business intelligently it is absolutely necessary to have intelligent and efficient employees to work in that mine or in that business. I can cite two instances in my district where within the last 15 or 16 years mines were operated by nonunion men. These mines were inclosed with stockades: there were militiamen on guard; one of them was equipped with Many persons were shot and killed. tion of unintelligent and inexperienced men occurred almost daily. The work in the mines was done improperly and without judgment. Many lives were lost in the mines by mine explosions and other inexcusable causes. Homes were made sad and the suffering of humanity untold. At last the conscienceless the suffering of humanity untold. operators came to their senses. Pulse began to beat in their iron hands. The mines companies were transferred to other management and the workingmen asked to organize themselves.

The nonunion operators, I am told, spent millions of dollars uselessly. One went broke, and the other quit. To-day these are among the largest and most prosperous mines in Illinois. Peace and harmony are on every side, and few, if a single man, have lost their lives in either of these mines.

So, Mr. Speaker, if these investigations do no more than to cause the operators of these mines to learn that their employees are human beings; no more than to permit the employees to organize and unionize, as the operators are organized and combined; no more than to teach the employer to extend his hand, with vein permeated with good, red, warm blood, across the chasm and take his employee by the hand in human sympathy and kindness, then I shall be content, and our efforts will not have been in vain.

The valleys in which these mines are located, where want, suffering, and disorder reign indescribable, will then be transformed into valleys of teeming happiness and merry song. Then we can congratulate ourselves for this investigation, as the country will congratulate us. We will all join in one grand chorus singing God's praise, because we have lent our assistance to suffering humanity.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick] has eight.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to start what I have to say by saying to my Democratic brethren that I approach this discussion in good temper. The other night at the caucus you were courteous enough to request the Committee on Rules to report this resolution. We reported it by unanimous consent, although it was not our judgment, but yours, on which we were acting. You did not bind any Democrat, and, of course, you could not bind any Republican, as to his vote upon the floor on this question, and you did not seek to do so; therefore I feel free to follow my own judgment in this matter, and every Democrat on this floor, whether he attended that caucus or not, no matter how he voted in the conference, is free, as free as air, to vote as he pleases, as he thinks right, as he thinks just about this matter. Now, the gentlemen who have spoken before me in opposition to this resolution have much shortened my remarks. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kelley] pointed out in a most able way the fact that we had already created an Industrial Commission, a commission the personnel of which has already been announced by our President, a personnel that compares favorably with that of any commission ever selected in this country, a commission of so high a personnel that its judgment, its reports, its findings, will be vastly stronger with the country, vastly more potent in molding and influencing public opinion than the influence of any and all the politicians we could send, who have to go out and seek votes in their districts next election day. [Applause.]
Somehow or other I think, without criticizing any man's motives, without casting any aspersions on them, that the picture each one of us draws is as to how we will look and feel when some demagogue, maybe, back in our districts—of course, there are none in the House—will say to us, "Did you vote against union labor and what they wanted when this question was up? Did you vote to investigate the great strike in Michigan and Colorado?" Gentlemen, I beg you this evening to rise gan and Colorado?" Gentlemen, I beg you this evening to rise above that plane in your discussion and decision of this question. You are not bound on this side by any caucus action or resolution to vote in any way except as your judgment and conscience tell you is right, and I beg you to put no other standard before you when you cast your votes.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kelley] refers to the commission. We are paying nine commissioners of the very highest character that this country can afford great salaries. They are given power to examine witnesses, to compel the production of books and papers, and look into every phase of these great industrial struggles-

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HARDWICK. I will not yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman has made a misstatement. Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman thinks I have made a misstatement I will yield, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. You state that we are paying these commissioners great salaries. We are paying them $10 a day for the time they work.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know we are paying them $10 a day and expenses. That is a large salary. It is intended they should work practically all the time. And I tell you we have appointed them to do just this sort of work. Their report of their findings would have a far greater weight in the great forum of public opinion than any report or any finding made by a committee composed of Members of Congress, seeking reelection in their respective districts, could ever have.

Let us go one step further. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], in one of the ablest short arguments I have ever heard in this House, pointed out to you that we did not have the power to investigate everything simply because some fellow shouted "Turn on the light." It is not popular to say "Shut off the light." The power of a legislative body to investigate is inherent, but is sharply limited. The principal purpose for which it may investigate is to determine how to legislate.

The proponents of this resolution rest their case on this. us see. They say that the peonage statutes are being violated. If so, we have the statutes already and the courts to enforce them. Do they suggest the peonage laws ought to be changed? If they do, there might be some gum in this contention. What else do they say? They say the immigration laws are being violated. Yet do they suggest the immigration laws be changed on that account? Do they suggest that this information will afford any light in that regard? They say that the postal facilities are being denied. Have we not the statutes already to prevent that? Have we not capable executive departments to enforce them—the Post Office Department, to which no appeal has been made in this case, and the Department of Justice, which has not been asked to do a thing to vindicate this muchvaunted law which has been outraged, as gentlemen vociferate.

Gentlemen, this is pretext plain, simple, pure, unvarnished. I ask you as honest Americans with good common sense not to be swept off your feet. My distinguished and beloved friend from Maryland the chairman of the Labor Committee will conclude this debate. He is an able lawyer and a gentleman who has made good in his own profession and stands high with the bar of his own State, and he probably will tell you, if he follows the plan he did in the caucus, that he can not discuss these great humanitarian questions as a lawyer. say that is not the way to do it. God knows I love the laboring people as much as he does; God knows I want to do right by them just as much as he does or as any other Member in this House. I want to call his attention to the fact that while I have not labored with the pick in the mine, while I have not worked with my hands as much as others have done perhaps, yet when we had one of the greatest railroad strikes in the South union labor chose me as one of its arbitrators under the Erdman law, and I helped settle that great issue. I mention this only to show that I can not be suspected of being against labor. I side with labor when I think labor is right, but, gentlemen, I implore you not to be swept off your feet by something for which there is no justification, except real or fancied political necessities.

These strikes are matters that belong exclusively to the jurisdiction of the States in which they are occurring. The questions raised by them are State and local, not Federal or National. The authority obligated to enforce the law, to preserve peace, and to maintain order, as well as to secure the rights of men, are the State and local authorities, not the Federal authorities. I well recall that when President Cleveland undertook to interfere in the great Chicago strike in the early nineties on the ground that it was necessary for him to do so to protect the United States mails, the very forces and influences that now demand the passage of this resolution then denounced his action as tyrannical and despotic and as in violation of the rights of the sovereign State of Illinois. And yet to-day, with not one-half as much on which to rest their appeal for Federal interference, these same forces are demanding Federal action in Colorado and Michigan in utter disregard of the rights and of the authority of the States of Colorado and For one I can not and will not yield to such a Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I told the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick] that I had only one speaker. If he has no objection, I would like to yield my remaining five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham].

Mr. HARDWICK. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it has been ably stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] that Congress has the right to make investigations for three and only Congress has the right to make investigations for three and only three purposes. One of these is to find facts which may be made the basis of legislation. The mere statement of the proposition shows that this power can be exercised in cases where no legislation results. It does not have to determine, it could not determine in advance of the investigation what the result will be. It may find facts fruitful of suggestion for legislation and it may find none.

Hence, there is no limitation beyond the discretion of the body itself as to when or what it will investigate for that purpose.

In this particular case surely there is enough information before us to justify the House in exercising its discretion in favor of an investigation, and I think it very probable that a full investigation of the conditions would give Congress information of great value for legislative purposes.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kelley] has called our attention to the enormous losses, direct and indirect, caused by

These losses are not confined to any State; their effects are interstate, indeed, country wide.

Strikes are very unfortunate things, but there are times when they are necessary. The smoothest water is not the purest. It takes agitation and even turbulent agitation to purify the waters. The sea is sometimes terrific in its violence, while the waters of the pool are serene and quiet. But—

The sea is sweet and rots not like the pool.

I wish strikes could be made unnecessary, and if by this investigation we can contribute something toward making them unnecessary it will be more than worth while.

The very able gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] insists Congress has no constitutional power to make this investigation, and the gentleman from Michigan seems to agree with him, but both of them point to the fact that Congress has by law provided for an Industrial Commission and clothed it with this very power, and they think that commission should make this investigation.

Are they not a little inconsistent in this? Congress did not exhaust its power nor even diminish it by the passage of that act. If it had the power to commission others to make this investigation, it surely has the power to make the investigation itself. And this applies to the House also. Legislation may be initiated in either the House or the Senate; hence either body, in order to ascertain the necessary facts, may make such preliminary investigations as it sees fit.

The conditions which we are told exist in both the Colorado and Michigan mining districts are certainly dreadful. The ordiand Alchigan mining districts are certainly dreadful. The ordinary laws seem to be suspended in both places, and, if the reports are nearly correct, a republican form of government has been superseded by the rule of hired thugs and private detectives. The light of publicity ought to be allowed to shine on the whole lamentable situation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] recognized for three minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that my friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] saw fit to characterize this resolution as a mere pretext. And I am very sorry that my other friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett], can see in it only an agency to secure publicity, with the result that may be produced here from multitudinous requests of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, we are to-day dealing with a most potential Federal question, a subject that raises the question, Shall the laws be so reformulated as to provide a peaceful remedy for these conflicts between labor and its employers? essential elements of that subject involve both State Federal institutions in the most direct way. For example, I think that all will agree that the feudal system is fundamentally inconsistent with American institutions and in conflict with our established civilization. And yet, let me say, that in the mining industry it is common for an incorporated company to own the land, own the mine, owns the jobs, own the store, and even the transportation, the means of ingress and egress to its one industry, town, or community. In that case I suggest you have the feudal system as complete as it has ever shown itself in history.

Now, in regard to just one of the incidents of this feudal institution, the company store. Many of the States have passed laws to make them unlawful, but the State courts have held such laws violative of the Federal Constitution. Now, nothing is more likely to provoke trouble between the employer and his workmen than this company store, with its un-American influences. Now, Congress might pass a statute which would give the Supreme Court jurisdiction to reverse these State courts, a thing it can not now do, when the decision is in favor of a claim set up under Federal law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. KELLEY of Michigan rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick].
Mr. HARDWICK. You can do it now. You can carry it to the Supreme Court.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman vield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I can not yield further. I want to say a word to Democrats here, who are peculiarly responsible, before it is too late. It is our highest duty to investigate these troubles, not with a view to pleasing either side, but with the object of finding preventive remedies for these great social conflicts, even if the Constitution needs amending. On one side the employer thinks that to meet his men collectively will imperil his property. On the other side it is only too well known that to meet him unorganized is to possess no rights that he is bound to respect and be completely subject to his will. That is feudalism and nothing less when whole communities are involved. We ought to find a way to conserve the rights of both. In the absence of adequate laws to conserve them we have two fires burning now. If one like that in Michigan and another like that in Colorado were to happen contemporaneously in every State in the Union we might have a Federal subject indeed on our hands. And yet gentlemen argue that we have no right to investigate and none to legislate. Sir, these questions ought not to be argued like a writ of replevin or a process in replevin. The Republic is not a mere piece of paper, a mere technical circumstance. It is a living organism, and the Websters and Calhouns who refused to treat as such 60 years ago surrendered their compatriots and country to the bloodiest conflict in history. May God grant that we do not repeat their folly. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amend-

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, all the amendments will be voted on at once.

There was no objection. -

SENATE.

Wednesday, January 28, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art our sun and shield. Thou dost give grace and glory. No good thing wilt Thou withhold from him who walkest uprightly. Thou dwellest in the ineffable light. We can not search Thee out. Thou art beyond all of our power to measure or grasp. We have seen the glory of Thy name in Thy great temple. More and more we desire with undimmed vision to behold Thy glory. Thou art our shield. Thou dost protect us from Thine own almightiness, and dost give to us the tenderest touch of love, and dost invite us to come into the wealth and fullness of a divine love.

So we submit gladly ourselves to Thee to be sheltered and guided and protected by the divine power, trusting only God for the final outcome of the great purpose of life which Thou dost give to each one of us. We pray that Thou wilt through us fulfill all Thy purposes. For Christ's sake. Amen.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire to have the Chair lay before the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 247) relative to the election of BLAIR LEE as Senator from the State of Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution 1-ferred to by the Senator from Indiana, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 247, reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 19th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That Blair Lee was duly and legally elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland at a regular election held in that State on the 4th day of November, 1913, and that the said Blair Lee, having presented proper credentials from the State of Maryland, is now entitled to take the oath of office as a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it is not to be assumed from anything that was said by the learned Senator from Utah [Mr.

SUTHERLAND] on this resolution a few days since, or from anything that was left unsaid by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that the majority of its members were laboring under any embarrassment at all in presenting an elaborate statement of the reasons which impelled them to the conclusions which are recited in the report. The importance of the subject, however, no less than the ability and earnestness with which contrary views were advanced by the distinguished Senator referred to, fully justify a more or less extended reference at this time to the arguments which influenced the conclusions at which the committee arrived.

It would be well, Mr. President, that the Senate should understand at the outset the nature of the controversy that arises beween the majority and the minority of the committee in their respective reports. It will be understood that the minority report concedes that the seventeenth amendment is now presently operative with respect to the selection of Senators to fill vacancies occasioned by the death, resignation, or expulsion of those Senators who had been elected prior to the adoption of the amendment. It is likewise conceded that, if adequate laws exist within any State contemplating providing for the election of United States Senators, whether those laws were enacted prior to the adoption of the amendment or since, an election valid in all respects may be held in the States so situated. It is contended, however, that such legislation must exist and that no such legislation, as a matter of fact, is found in the State of Maryland.

It was argued on behalf of Mr. Lee in the first place that such legislation is not necessary; that the right to hold an election under the writ issued by the governor follows, from the language of the Constitution, without express legislation by the States; that is to say, that the right given by the Constitution to the governor to issue his writs of election to fill vacancies gives him the power, in the absence of legislation, to prescribe the time, place, and manner of the holding of the election. But it is contended likewise that, even though that contention is considered as untenable, the legislation of the State of Maryland is ample to justify, warrant, and authorize the holding of an election for Senator.

The seventeenth amendment, now operative and important for consideration here, reads as follows:

ARTICLE XVII.

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointment until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

It is contended, as I have stated, that the language found here "when vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies" entitles the governor of the State, as incidental to the right by it reposed in him, to prescribe the times, places, and manner, in the absence of State legislation. I desire, Mr. President, to take a little time to lay before the Senate the considerations advanced in support of that view, and it is not at all to be dismissed, as seemed to be the view of the distinguished Senator from the State of Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], himself an able lawyer, in the course of a colleguy with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHER-LAND] the other day, as scarcely to be debated.

The fourth section of the first article of the original Consti-tution does, indeed, provide that "the times, places, and man-ner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof"; then it provides that the Congress may "make or alter such regulations," and the point is made that because the power is by that section granted to Congress to prescribe the times, places and manner, it follows as a necessary conclusion that that right does not rest in the governor by virtue of this other pro-vision of the Constitution. The language of the amendment in this respect is taken from the language of the original Constitution in relation to the manner of filling vacancies in the House of Representatives, and the question arises as to whether like power exists under the Constitution with reference to Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, it is submitted that there is no necessary conflict in the Constitution as it was framed. The proposition should be accurately stated in this way: It is urged that this section to which I have invited your attention, the fourth section of the first article, must be read in connection with this other provision of the Constitution which provides that, in case of vacancies in the House of Representatives, the executive authority of the State "shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies" ; that the two are to be harmonized, and that both are to be given force and significance, if it is possible to do so. So, Mr. President, it is advanced that the power of the governor to make necessary regulations that an election may be held arises by necessary implication, but that it exists only when the legislature has failed to make the requisite provision, or, if the provision does not go as far as is necessary for the holding of elections, the defect may be supplied by the governor. In effect, it is contended that the power of the governor alleged to exist is a power quite analogous to that which is reposed in a court to make rules and regulations governing its procedure. By the general grant of power to a legislature it has full authority to lay down rules and regulations which shall govern the procedure in a State court. Congress has prescribed the procedure which shall be observed in Federal courts, constitutional as well as those created by law. Whenever a court is created and no provision is made in relation to the procedure that is to govern it, of necessity power is given to that court to make such rules and such regulations as are necessary to make effective the jurisdiction granted to it-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President-

Mr. WALSH. Just one moment-but if the legislature does go on and prescribe the procedure to be followed, to that extent the authority and right of the court to lay down rules is circumscribed and its authority thereafter is restricted to the region that is not covered by the legislation enacted by the lawmaking body. Accordingly, in exactly the same way, it is contended that, in the absence of legislation by the State, the right rests with the governor to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding the election.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the Senator has said with reference to the power of the court to make rules and regulations governing its own procedure, at least within limits; but suppose the constitution of the State, if we were dealing with a State court, had prescribed that rules and regulations governing the procedure of courts should be prescribed by the legislature, then would the Senator say that still the court had the power to prescribe such rules and regulations?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, I should unhesitatingly by so. Not only that, but I assert that the constitution of say so. Not only that, but I assert that the constitution of practically every State does say so when it grants to the legislature general legislative authority. Under that grant of general legislative authority the legislature is authorized to prescribe the procedure to be observed in courts. It might just as well have said: "General legislative power is hereby granted to the legislature, including the right to prescribe the procedure that shall be followed in courts." Every court would still have the right to prescribe its rules, subject and subordinate to the procedure thus prescribed and covering conditions that were not provided for by the statute.

But, Mr. President, I wish to invite attention particularly to one aspect of this question. I apprehend, sir, that whatever may be said with respect to the right of the governor, under this grant of power, to lay down rules in respect to the place and in respect to the manner of holding a special election to fill a vacancy, still it can not be successfully controverted that he has the implied power to prescribe the time at which that special election should be held.

The distinguished Senator from Utah controverts that proposition, and asserts that it is within the power of the legislature-and no doubt that is correct-to prescribe that a special election shall not be held except upon a certain notice; in other words, that it can not be held until the expiration of a particular period of time. You will all note, however, that in the very necessities of the case that is as far as the legislature can go toward prescribing the time at which a special election shall take place. Upon reflection, 'I think everyone will concede that that is far from a provision prescribing the time. In other words, when a constitution prescribes that no election shall be held except upon 30 days' notice, it has not prescribed the time when such election shall occur. The fixing of the exact time still remains for the legislature.

I recall very well that the constitution of my native State of Wisconsin provides that no judicial election shall be held at any time within six months of a general election, which, it was provided, should be held in the month of November. No one will assert that the time at which judicial elections are to be held in the State of Wisconsin is prescribed by the constitution. It became necessary in view of this provision to legislate upon the matter, and the legislature of the State fixed the time.

So it must be conceded that in this power granted to the governor to issue writs of election to fill vacancies there is granted to him, by implication at least, the power to fix the time at which the special election is to be held. Therefore the grant of power in section 4 of Article I, general in its terms, made to the legislature to fix the time, place, and manner, is limited to some extent at least in the case of the filling of a vacancy. It is not absolute, but gives way in part to the necessary implications arising from the other provision of the Constitution.

It was made to yield in another respect also. Though the obligation rests upon the legislatures of States, the first Representatives from the new States, save in the case of Missouri and Texas, were admitted on elections conducted under regulations prescribed by the legislatures of Territories.

The Senator from Utah suggested many difficulties and incongruities that might arise under such an interpretation. governor might, he suggested, in one case prescribe that the election should be held upon a notice of 10 days; in another case, upon a notice of 30 days. In one case he might prescribe that the election should be by viva voce, and in another case by ballot. In one case he might prescribe that it should be under the old system of an open ballot, and in another case under the Australian-ballot system. Likewise it was suggested that the regulations which he prescribed might be in conflict with the regulations prescribed by the State legislature. That, as I have indicated, can not happen, because it is conceded that so far as the legislature acts, his power is cut off. With respect to the other situations, however, they may, indeed, arise, and probably would arise, in practice, because the laws in relation to elections are a growth. Doubtless if the election had been called 50 years ago, the call would contemplate the choice by open ballot, and if it were called now it would contemplate voting by the Australian system.

You will bear in mind, however, that whenever this power is exercised by the governor he exercises it more or less under the control of the prevailing public sentiment, which exerts a governing influence. Not only that, but his action in the premises is subject to review by this body. If the rules and regulations which he prescribes are unreasonable, or if they are not in accord with the spirit of the age, or if they contradict the principles that are recognized as proper in proceedings of that character, not only will he be condemned by public sentiment, but in all probability the Senator claiming to be elected will not be seated by this body, because the election was not conducted under rules and regulations calculated to bring about a free expression of the choice of the people. Besides, legislatures are not likely to be so derelict as to invite repetitions of the exercise of the power by a governor.

But perhaps more weighty and important than these considerations is one to which I desire now to advert. As indicated to you by the Senator from Utah, at a very early period in our history this question was presented to the House of Representatives. The old Constitution provided:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State-

That is, in the House of Representatives-the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies—practically the same language as that before us.

A vacancy having occurred in the representation from the State of Pennsylvania in the year 18—, the governor of that State issued a writ of election to fill the vacancy. It was pretty generally conceded that there was no statute in the State of Pennsylvania which provided for a special election to fill a vacancy in the House of Representatives.

The governor directed that the election should be held, however, at the time and place at which the general elections were held throughout the State, two days' notice only being given of the fact that the Representative was to be elected at the same time and place. The seat of Mr. Hoge, the successful candidate, was contested.

When the matter came before the House, the question now being discussed was debated at length and with much learning and marked ability. It was contended in that connection that by implication and of necessity the power to fix the time, place, and manner of holding the election to fill a vacancy was reposed in the governor by virtue of the provision above quoted whenever the State itself had failed to observe its duty under the provisions of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution.

It having been found that the election was fair in all respects, and that the people of the district had reasonable notice that the election was to take place, the candidate having the largest number of votes was seated by the House of Representatives. That case has thus become a precedent upon the construction of this provision of the old Constitution.

It is true that the very question has never since been presented to the House of Representatives, but I have examined the original statutes of the 13 original States in relation to holding elections for Members of the House of Representatives and I find that very few of them, just like the statute of the State of Pennsylvania, made any specific provision for the case of an election to fill a vacancy, and yet apparently those elected from the various States to fill vacancies—and there must have been such—were admitted to seats in the House of Representatives just as in the case of the State of Pennsylvania,

However, this provision of the Constitution was at least twice since under consideration by the House of Representatives. I desire to read briefly what was said in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in one of these cases, referring to the other, concerning the implied power contended for bare

In the case of Hunt v. Menard, referring to the minority report in Perkins v. Morrison, the committee quotes as follows:

The second section of the first article in the Constitution contains the following provision: "When vacancies occur in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." This is the only provision of law on the subject of vacancies, and it is ample and sufficient.

Then the committee, in the case of Hunt v. Menard, adds:

This reasoning, which your committee consider as sound and pertinent, applied to the case under consideration, seems to be conclusive against this election.

So that twice since the House of Representatives have declared that in the absence of State legislation this provision of the Constitution, in and of itself, is sufficient to authorize the holding of an election to fill a vacancy.

These holdings, however—the decision in the Hoge case and the declarations thus made—ought to have here before us now very much more weight, are entitled to very much more consideration, than that accorded to mere precedents, because in the amendment under consideration, the seventeenth amendment, is found the very language that was thus construed by the House of Representatives. Under well-settled principles of law there has been adopted the construction which was thus given to it, and it is a part of our fundamental law now as much as though it were actually written at length in the seventeenth amendment. The rule is very well established that whenever the highest court in a State construes certain language in a statute and gives to it a certain meaning, and thereafter another statute is enacted by the same State in which is found the same language, the legislature is presumed to know the construction which was given to it originally and to intend that the language in the new statute shall have exactly the same construction as was given to it in the old.

This principle, of course, is well recognized, but its force may not be appreciated as fully as it ought to be if we do not attend to its recital in this connection.

I read, accordingly, from section 403 of Sutherland on Statutory Construction. He says:

In the interpretation of reenacted statutes the court will follow the construction which they received when previously in force. The legislature will be presumed to know the effect which such statutes originally had, and by reenactment to intend that they should again have the same effect. The same rule applies to the readoption of a constitutional provision. It is not necessary that a statute should be reenacted in identical words in order that the rule may apply. It is sufficient if it is reenacted in substantially the same words.

So that, however any of us might be inclined to doubt the wisdom or the soundness of the conclusion at which the House of Representatives arrived concerning the meaning of this language, this principle of law to which reference has been made seems to compel us to abandon our own judgment concerning the matter and to adopt the construction which was given to it by the tribunal vested with the authority under the Constitution to determine its meaning.

I might say in this connection—and it seems quite proper that I should—that a very liberal rule has been established by the unvarying practice of the House of Representatives concerning the admission of one who has been elected by the people as a Member of that House where no question is made concerning the fairness of the election under which he claims.

Thus, the Territory of Hawaii was granted the right to have a Delegate in Congress, elected by the people of the islands. No provision was made by the act of Congress for the holding of elections. It was assumed that the Legislature of Hawaii would make the proper provision, but it omitted to do so. Notwithstanding the absence of any express law, an election for Delegate to Congress from the Hawaiian Islands was held, it being conducted in accordance with the statutes of the islands

In relation to the election of members of their local legislature. When the Delegate came to the House, during the Fifty-ninth Congress, it was contended that there was no law of the islands which authorized the election, but he was seated, notwithstanding. A contest was initiated before the Fifty-ninth Congress against the seat of the present Delegate, who was elected under identically the same circumstances, and he likewise was seated by the House,

So, Mr. President, if we were obliged to rely upon the contention which I have thus far canvassed, the conclusion of the committee would not be without ample justification. We do not, however, need to rely upon any such construction of the Constitution, doubtful as it may seem to be to some Senators. I am convinced, sir, that an examination of the statutes of the State of Maryland will satisfy almost any candid investigator that they are quite ample to justify the election under which Mr. Lee claims a seat among us.

I wish to invite your attention to these statutes and to remind you that they are all to be read in view of the definition of the word "election" as given in section 120 of the chapter of the Maryland statutes in relation to elections, which is as

The word "election" as used in this article shall be construed to include elections had within any county or city for the purpose of enabling voters to choose some public officer or officers under the laws of this State or of the United States, or to pass upon any amendment, law, or other public act or proposition submitted to vote by law.

The word "election" in the election statutes of Maryland. accordingly, reaches to all elections for officers of the United This was an act passed in the year 1896.

Now, bear in mind that it has been held-and I think without any variation at all-that electors of President and Vice President are officers of the State, not officers of the United Accordingly the only officers of the United States who, at the time this act was adopted, were elected by the people of the State were the Members of the House of Representatives.

If it was intended that this section should apply only to Members of the House of Representatives, it would have said so in explicit and direct terms. The language of this act clearly indicates to us that the Legislature of the State of Maryland at the time it enacted this law had in contemplation that in the future an amendment would be adopted, or might be adopted, that would provide for the election by the people of some United States officers other than the Members of the House of Representatives. Of course, we all know, as a part of the history of this measure, that it was then being earnestly debated by the people of the United States whether United States Senators should not be elected by the people.

So I assert, sir, that by plain declaration the people of Maryland here indicated their desire that whenever it should come to pass that United States Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people their election statutes should be held applicable. Unless you give to this statute such a construction as that, it is absolutely meaningless, it has no significance at all, nor was there any perceptible purpose in its enactment.

Now, then, let us turn to the statutes of the State of Mary land, having this definition clearly in mind, to see what they say. We will see whether Maryland has provided the machinery for the holding of an election for United States Senator.

Section 1. The governor biennially, by and with the advice and consent of the senate if in session, and if not in session, then the governor alone, shall appoint, in each and every county of the State and in the city of Baltimore, three persons who shall constitute and be styled "the board of supervisors of elections of the respective counties and of said city."

Now, applying the definition of the word "election" to that it means boards of supervisors for elections for State officers and elections of United States officers as well.

Then section 14 prescribes:

Said board of supervisors shall give 10 days' notice of the time and place of registration, and of revision thereof, and of elections—

Now, elections for United States officers-in each precinct of such county or city by handbills set up in the most public places in such precinct—providing for notification and registration.

Then section 41 provides for the nomination of all candidates for public office as follows:

Any convention or primary meeting, as hereinafter defined, held for the purpose of making nominations to public office, and also voters to the number hereinafter specified, may nominate candidates for public office to be filled by election within the State.

Observe, "to be filled by election within the State."

Any convention or primary meeting, as hereinafter defined, held for the purpose of making nominations to public office, and also voters to the number hereinafter specified, may nominate candidates for public office to be filled by election within the State. A convention or primary meeting within the meaning of this section is an organized assemblage of delegates or voters representing a particular party or principle.

Section 42 provides for nominations, how the nomination of candidates shall be made, and when they shall be made by conventions. If no nomination is made by a convention, provision is made in section 43 for nominations otherwise:

A candidate for public office may be nominated otherwise than by a convention.

Now, note always the general language that is used. A candidate for public office may be nominated otherwise than by a convention or primary election in the manner following.

Section 44 provides for the filing of certificates of nomination: Certificates of nominations shall be filed with the secretary of state for the nomination of Members of Congress or of candidates for offices to be filled by voters of the entire State.

It does not say for State officers, but all candidates for all offices to be filled-by voters of the entire State or of any subdivision of a greater extent than one county.

Section 47-

Except in cases provided for by section 51 and cases of special election to fill vacancies in office caused by death, resignation, or otherwise such certificates of nomination shall be filed respectively with the secretary of state not less than 25 days and with the board of supervisors of elections not less than 15 days before the day of election.

Section 48 for the transmission of the names of candidates that they may go on the ballot:

Not less than 18 days before an election to fill any public office the secretary of state shall certify to the supervisors of elections of each county within which any of the voters may by law vote for candidates for such office the name and description of each person nominated for

Section 53-observe again the general language:

All ballots cast in elections for public officers within this State shall be printed and distributed as hereinafter provided.

It goes on and states the manner. Section 54-

It shall be the duty of the board of supervisors of elections of each county and of the city of Baltimore to provide ballots for every election for public officers held under this article in which any voters within the county or said city shall participate, and cause to be printed on the ballot the name of every candidate whose name has been certified to or filed with the proper officers in the manner herein provided by such political party organization or body of individuals.

Here provision is made for getting the names of candidates on the ballot. Under a great many statutes considerable embarrassment may arise in this particular. In my State but for the provisions of the recent statute we would have labored under a serious difficulty here, because the corresponding statute, prescribing the methods for the preparation of the ballot, directs that the county clerk or recorder shall make up the ballots in the following form: Candidates for governor, candidates for lieutenant governor, candidates for Members of Congress, and so on, enumerating all officers whose names are congress, and so on, enumerating an onicers whose names are to go upon the ballot. If asked to put on the ballot the names of the candidates for United States Senator he might properly point to the statute and say, "I am not authorized to do anything of that kind." But in Maryland they had apparently just such a contingency in contemplation, and met it by declaring it to be the duty of the proper officer to put on the ballot the names of all candidates for public office. ballot the names of all candidates for public office.

Let me direct your attention to a few more of these statutes: 55. The form and arrangement of the ballots shall be as follows: All ballots shall contain the name of every candidate whose nomination for any office specified in the ballot has been certified to and filed according to the provisions of this article, and not withdrawn in accordance herewith.

56. The form and arrangement of ballot shall be as follows: All ballots shall contain the name of every candidate whose nomination for any office specified in the ballots has been certified and filed according to the provisions of this article, and not withdrawn in accordance therewith.

I want to invite your attention now especially to the provisions found in sections 123 and 124:

123. At least 30 days before every State election the attorney general shall prepare full instructions for the guidance of the voters at such election as to obtaining ballots, as to the manner of marking them, and as to obtaining new ballots in place of those accidentally destroyed, with such other instructions as shall in his opinion be necessary and proper.

So you will observe that a specific duty is laid upon the attorney general of the State to make out official instructions to the voters, telling them how to prepare their ballots and all that sort of thing.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator read that language again? Mr. WALSH (reading)-

At least 30 days before every State election the attorney general shall prepare full instructions for the guidance of the voters at such election as to obtaining ballots, as to the manner of marking them, and as to obtaining new ballots in place of those accidentally destroyed, with such other instructions as shall in his oplinion be necessary and proper. Said instructions shall be furnished by the secretary of state to the several boards of supervisors of elections, who shall respectively cause the same, together with copies of sections 68, 69, and 70 of this article to be printed in large, clear type on separate cards, etc.

So, Mr. President, the Attorney General is thus made the official adviser of the electors of the State in the discharge of this important function of citizenship.

These statutes, I think it must appear to all, in view of the defining statute, quite cover the case. But there is another consideration here which strengthens the position taken by the committee. The governor of the State appealed to the Attorney General at the very outset of these proceedings for official advice as to whether an election should be held and could be held under the provisions of these laws and the Constitution of the United States for the choice of United States Senator in the State of Maryland. You have been advised that the Attorney General directed the governor that an election was proper and that it could be held under the laws in force. Now, bear in mind that the governor having proceeded to issue his writ of election, it was within the power of any citizen of the State of Maryland to interrupt the proceedings at the beginning, if they were unwarranted, by an appeal to the proper courts to prevent the expenditure of public funds for the conduct of an election which was not authorized by law. Nothing of the kind was done. The governor of the State of Maryland, who is not of the same political faith as the successful candidate, believed that the laws of that State authorized the holding of an election or he never would have issued his writ of election. All of the various political parties in that State and the representatives of the various parties in that State believed that the laws of Maryland authorized the holding of an election, or some of them would have been found who would have appealed to the process of the courts to prevent its being held.

It was stated here by the distinguished Senator from Utah that Senator Jackson, in whose behalf resistance is now made to the seating of Senator Lee, actually participated in the election and voted at it. Of course, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the principles of estoppel in pais have no application here; but, Mr. President, that fact in connection with the others to which I have adverted speaks very loudly the conviction of the entire people of the State of Maryland that their laws were ample, as they indeed were, for the conduct of this election. That is of itself a circumstance of no little moment, for it was likewise repeatedly declared by the House of Representatives in connection with the construction to be given to the language that is now under consideration that whenever the authorities of a State charged with the duty of putting into force and execution the election laws of such State have given to those laws a certain construction, have assigned to their language a certain meaning, the House of Representatives, whatever might be its own view about the matter, would, unless the construction given was obviously wrong, adopt the construction which had thus been given to them locally.

I read from the report made in the case of George W. Mc-Crary, of Iowa, considered in the year 1871. The committee said:

If, however, the question as to whether by the act of 1870 the time for holding the election in question was changed from August to November was one of doubt, we should feel bound to follow the construction given to it by all the authorities of the State of Tennessee whose duty it has been to construe it and to execute it. It is admitted that the governor and all other authorities in Tennessee having anything to do with the construction and enforcement of this act of 1870 have construct it as in no wise affecting the act of 1868, and by common and universal assent the election was held at the time fixed in the latter act. It is a well-established and most salutary rule that where the proper authorities of the State government have given a construction to their own constitution or statutes that construction will be followed by the Federal authorities. This rule is absolutely necessary to the harmonious working of our complex Governments, State and National, and your committee are not disposed to be the first to depart from it. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President—

Mr. KERN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Johnson in the chair) Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. KERN. I suggest to the Senator that the report was made by Representative McCrary, who was a Representative from Iowa, and who is the author of the work, McCrary on Elections. He was the author of the report.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is right. It was on the admission of Edouard Gilbert and George W. Wright as Members from California, cases considered by the Thirty-first Congress, in the year 1850.

Mr. KERN. Mr. McCrary was at that time a Representative from the State of Iowa and chairman of the Committee on Elections.

Mr. WALSH. That is correct, and undoubtedly he has declared here the very generally accepted and, in fact, undisputed rule.

Mr. President, in this particular case, however, we have not only the acquiescence of the entire people of the State of Maryland, the action of the governor, and all the election officers, and the opinion of the attorney general of the State, but we have the action of the Court of Appeals of that State recognizing the force and effect of these statutes as adequate for a senatorial election. It appears, Mr. President, that the Progressive Party were a little late in filing the nominations made by that party for the three officers for which the people were called upon to vote-United States Senator, controller, and clerk of the court of appeals. Some of the local officials refused to file the nomination certificates tendered by the candidates of that party, and they appealed to the court for a writ of mandamus to compel acceptance. The court held that, as a matter of fact, the officer was right; that they had in fact come too late with the nominations; but in a most com-mendable spirit of fairness the court of appeals advised that the committee of the Progressive Party was authorized under the law to file nominations which it might make for these various places, as in the case of the occurrence of a vacancy. In other words, Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the State of Maryland took jurisdiction of the case, held in effect that the seventeenth amendment authorized the election of United States Senators, and that the laws of the State of Maryland required and authorized an election for that office. So, after declaring that the lower court was correct in denying the mandamus, it said as follows:

But inasmuch as the court was requested by the parties to state its conclusions as to the right of the committee of the Progressive Party to now make nominations for the three offices under the provisions of the statute, the court further announces that in its judgment the said committee can, under the authority vested in it to fill vacancies as admitted in this case, make such nominations in accordance with the provisions of section 51 of article 33 of the Code of 1912, and if the certificate of nominations is properly executed and filed as provided by said section, it will be the duty of the secretary of state to certify said nominations to the supervisors of elections of the several counties of the State and the city of Baltimore.

Mr. President, in that connection let us take up the statutes to which I have invited your attention, and let us see if we can learn what there is lacking in them which the distinguished Senator from Utah would have supplied by specific legislation. They cover, as you will observe, the places and the manner of holding elections; they cover specifically everything that could be required except the matter of time. There is no provision in the statutes which I have read which in express terms refers to the time at which an election shall be held. If the Legislature of the State of Maryland were called together in extra session for the purpose of legislating upon this particular subject matter, there is not a feature of it with which it could deal on which it has not already spoken, except the mere matter of time. The making of nominations; the printing of the names on the ballot; the preparation and forwarding of the returns; all of these things are provided for by general and comprehensive

Let us see how well the subject of time is covered, Mr. President. In the opening of my argument I invited your attention to the fact that, whatever may be said in relation to the implied power of the governor relative to the places and manner of holding elections, he undoubtedly has the implied power of designating the time at which a special election shall be held to fill a vacancy. If the Legislature of the State of Maryland were convened in special session, it could not add anything by a declaration that United States Senators shall be elected by a direct vote of the people, because the Constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land, has already provided for that; it would not add anything to what it has already said in regard to the places and manner of holding the election, as I have indicated, and the governor is undoubtedly given the power, in the case of a special election, to designate the time at which that special election must take place.

Mr. President, even if this were the case of a general election, it is, I think, fully provided for in the statutes and in the constitution of Maryland. The Senator from Utah correctly said to you that the constitution of Maryland prescribes that the governor shall be elected on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November; it prescribes that Members of the House of Representatives shall be elected on that day, and that electors of President and Vice President shall be elected on that day, But, Mr. President, I observe that it does not make any provision at all, for instance, as to when a sheriff is to be elected.

The constitution provides that a sheriff shall be elected in each county for a term of two years, but the most careful search that I have been able to give both to the constitution and the statutes of Maryland reveals no provision whatever with respect to the time at which sheriffs shall be elected; and yet the State of Maryland has gone on electing a sheriff in every county since the statutes referred to were passed in 1896, and electing sheriffs at the time at which the election for these other officers takes place. I will show you what justification there is for it; and I think it is ample. Let me read the provision of the constitution of Maryland in relation to sheriffs:

Sec. 49. There shall be elected in each county and in the city of Baltimore in every second year one person, resident in said county or city, above the age of 25 years, and at least five years preceding his election a citizen of this State, to the office of sheriff. He shall hold his office for two years, and until his successor is duly elected and qualified; shall be ineligible for two years thereafter; shall give such bond, exercise such powers, and perform such duties as now are or may hereafter be fixed by law. In case of a vacancy by death, refusal to serve, or neglect to qualify or give bond, by disqualification or removal from the county or city, the governor shall appoint a person to be sheriff for the remainder of the official term.

You will observe that no time for the election is fixed at all. Now, by way of contrast, let me read to you the section which refers to the election of an attorney general. It is as follows:

SECTION 1. There shall be an attorney general elected by the qualified voters of the State on general ticket on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November—

A later provision of the constitution of Maryland-section 7 of article 15-covers the case of the sheriff, in my judgment. It provides as follows:

All general elections in this State shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November in the year in which they shall occur.

All general elections shall be held at that time. "general election"? A general election is one which takes place throughout the State; it is contrasted with a local election. A general election is one which is held in each county in the State, and ordinarily for the election of a considerable number of officers.

So, Mr. President, I think we may fairly say, in view of the action that has uniformly been had under this provision of the constitution of the State of Maryland, that this section means that all officers who are to be elected by a general vote of the people of the State are, in the absence of specific provision, to be elected on the Tuesday after the first Monday in the month of November. So I believe that the case of an election, not to fill a vacancy but for a United States Senator, to serve for a full term, is thus taken care of in the laws of the State of Maryland.

Then, Mr. President, if the conclusion is reached that a valid election was had, we are confronted with the question of when the candidate thus elected is entitled to take his seat. The amendment, in its last clause-the third clause-provides as

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

It is contended that, under the language of that part of the amendment, the term of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. JACKSON], if it may be so called, extends until the adjournment of the session of the Legislature of Maryland now sitting. That depends upon the construction that is to be given to the amendment in connection with the provision of the original Constitution in relation to the filling of vacancies. On the death of the late Senator Rayner the junior Senator from Maryland was appointed by the governor of that State. He was appointed by virtue of this provision of the original Constitution; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

More or less obscurity exists by reason of the concluding language of this clause-until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

That clause has been the subject of very earnest debate in this body and of frequent consideration by it. It was very ably canvassed in this body in the year 1853, in connection with the case of Mr. Samuel S. Phelps, of Vermont, who was appointed by the governor of that State to occupy a seat which had become vacant. The Legislature of the State of Vermont having convened, it was contended that, under the correct construction of this clause, his right to a seat in the Senate thereupon and thereby terminated. The committee having the matter in charge held otherwise, and it is doubtless true that it has become the settled rule of this body, by virtue of the decision in that case and in other cases, that in the case of an appointment made under the old Constitution the appointee was entitled to retain his seat in this body until the legislature elected a successor or it had adjourned without electing.

The other view was very ably presented by the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Bayard. He contended that the correct construction to be given to this provision is that the appointee ceases to have the right to sit in this body immediately upon the convening of the legislature, and I am inclined to believe that almost every student of the Constitution gains, as his first impression, that view from the reading of it. It was contended, however, upon the other side that the words "until the next meeting of the legislature" modify the word "make," and that they simply limit the power of the governor to appoint; that is to say, that the clause means that the governor of the State has the right to make appointments during the recess of the legislature, but if he defers making the appointment until the legislature convenes, he has thereafter no right to make it; in other words, that it is a limitation upon the power of the governor to make the appointment and not a limitation upon the time during which the appointee is entitled to sit.

I am inclined to believe that the correct construction to be given to that language is as though it read "the executive thereof may make temporary appointments, to be in force until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." I submit that, if it is given any other construction, the word "vacancies" has no place here, because, obviously, if the man who sits here is a Senator at all, there is no vacancy to be filled. The use of the language "shall then fill such vacancies" contemplates that his right exhausted itself when the legislature convened, and that then there was a vacancy-either that or else we are forced to the conclusion that the appointee of the governor has no term; that his sitting here does not fill the vacancy at all; and that it continued at all times from the time that it originally came into existence.

It was then pointed out by Mr. Bayard that if the other construction is to be given to this provision, the right of the appointee to sit is not terminated even by the adjournment of the session of the legislature; at least there is no provision that it shall. If the view of the eminent statesman referred to is accepted, Senator Jackson has ceased to be a Member of this body, as the Legislature of Maryland is now sitting. But, as I have said, the construction to which I have alluded has been adopted. Accordingly, we have to read the language "until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies," as simply limiting the power of the governor to appoint, and, accordingly, the time during which the appointee is to serve is not limited by any language of the Constitution at all.

If the clause in question is to be given the other construction, as limiting the right of the appointee, then the Senate did violence to the language of the Constitution for the purpose of better carrying out the intention of its framers by permitting the appointee to sit until his successor is elected, as provided in the Constitution. Accordingly, we are forced to the conclusion that what the Constitution means is this: That there being no language of limitation, the appointee of the governor—bear in mind it is denominated a "temporary appointment"—that the appointee of the governor is simply entitled to sit until his successor is elected in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. Of course, no successor can ever again be elected by the legislature. No injustice is done to the sitting Member. His right might be terminated at any time by the selection of a Senator to fill the vacancy in the manner prescribed in the Constitution. The very day that Senator Jackson was designated for this place by the governor of Maryland, that officer might at once have issued his command to the legislature to convene in extra session. Having convened, they could proceed to elect a successor, as prescribed by the Constitution, and Senator Jackson's right to sit would be terminated when the person so elected should present his credentials here. Now, the governor, instead of calling together the elective body-the legislature-to fill the vacancy, might immediately upon the adoption of the seventeenth amendment have called a special election to fill the vacancy, and the electorate, substituted by it, would have filled it accordingly; so that no complaint can be made when Senator Jackson is permitted to sit until his successor is

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly. Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he is thoroughly satisfied that the governor of the State of Maryland might have called a special session for the purpose of electing a United States Senator?

It seems to me there is no question about that. Mr. STERLING. Can the Senator give us the terms of the Maryland constitution in regard to the power of the governor to convene the legislature in extraordinary session?

Mr. WALSH. I can not. I simply assume that he has that Mr. STERLING. If a State constitution should provide in terms, as does, for example, the constitution of the State of South Dakota, that the governor may call the legislature in extraordinary session or in special session on extraordinary occasions-I think that is about the language-would the Senator from Montana regard the election of a United States Senator as an extraordinary occasion, the governor under the Constitution of the United States having the power to fill the place by appointment until the next regular session?

Mr. WALSH. Of course the Senator from South Dakota, being an able lawyer, will recognize that there is no power on earth that can review the discretion of the governor in calling a special session. If the constitution provides that he may on extraordinary occasions convene the legislature in extra session. he is himself the sole judge of whether the occasion is of sufficient gravity to require the convening of the legislature in extra session; and the validity of acts passed at a session of that character could not be questioned by the Supreme Court, for instance, upon a suggestion that the occasion was not of sufficient gravity to require the exercise of the power.

Mr. STERLING. Without disagreeing with the Senator from Montana that as a proposition of law the governor, in his discretion, may determine what is an entraordinary occasion, the Senator, of course, recalls many elections by legislatures of Senators to fill vacancies; and I should like to ask if he does now recall any instance where the legislature was called in special session for the purpose of filling a vacancy

Mr. WALSH. I do not. I have no such precedent in mind. Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CHILTON. In answer to the question of the Senator from South Dakota, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Montana that in West Virginia a provision of our constitution is that no business can be entered upon by the legislature, when called in special session, except that mentioned in the call. There is a precedent here in the Senate, some time in the nineties, or perhaps in the eighties, where the governor called the legislature together and did not mention in the call the electing of a United States Senator. It was then contended that the election was not valid; but the Senate held that whether the governor mentioned it in the call or not, it was the duty of the legislature at any session to elect a Senator if there was a vacancy, and the Senate held that under the State constitution the legislature could elect whether the governor designated it or not.

Mr. WALSH. And did they elect?

Mr. CHILTON. They did elect. They elected Senator Faulkner. The appointee of the governor, Senator Lucas, made a contest; and the Senate held that it was the duty of the legislature of the State, regardless of the State constitution, to make an election at any session, whether it was special or regular.

Mr. WALSH. And Senator Faulkner was seated; was he

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes; he was seated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite agree with the statement of the Senator from Montana, that the legislature, when called in extra session, has the power to elect a United States Senator; and it would make no difference whether or not we regard the election of a United States Senator as an extraordinary occasion justifying the calling of the legislature under the language of the Constitution, because the terms of the Constitution of the United States are that the executive may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature. whether we regard the phrase "until the next meeting of the legislature" as a limitation on the power of the governor to act, as I believe it to be, or as a limitation upon the term of office, as others believe it to be, still the following clause is:

Which shall then-

I emphasize the word "then"fill such vacancies.

That is, at the next meeting.

The only inquiry we would have to make would be whether or not the legislature had met. Having met, no matter what the occasion, it became its duty to elect a United States Senator under the mandatory provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. I think the statement of the Senator from Utah is correct with respect to that. I will ask the attention of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Sterling] likewise to the fact that the language of the Constitution is "the next meeting of the legislature," not "the next session," so that if the legislature should happen to be in recess at the time the vacancy occurred, the right to appoint or the term of the appointee would expire at the next meeting of the legislature.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Montana will pardon me further, the whole spirit of this provision of the Constitution is that the legislature is recognized as the primary power to choose Senators, but that while the legislature is in recess it has no power to act; and therefore to tide over that situation, the Constitution contemplates that the governor, as a secondary appointing power, shall step in; but the moment the primary power becomes capable of acting, then it must act, under the Constitution, as the primary authority.

Mr. WALSH. As pointed out, no matter what construction you give to this language you are confronted with embarrassments, because if the death of a Senator should occur on the very day of the convening of the legislature it would be some time before an election could be had, in all probability; that, even if you give the language the construction for which the Senator contends, you can readily conceive of a case where there would be no representation.

I have before me the provision of the constitution of the State of Maryland in relation to the convening of the legisla-ture in extra session. It is section 16 of Article II and reads as follows:

The governor shall convene the legislature or the senate alone on extraordinary occasions; and whenever from the presence of an enemy or from any other cause the seat of government shall become an unsafe place for the meeting of the legislature he may direct their sessions to be held at some other convenient place.

So, if there is to be given to this language of the original Constitution the construction that is assigned to it by the decision of the Senate in the Phelps case—namely, that the conclud-ing portion is a limitation upon the power of the governor to appoint and fixes the time within which he can appoint, and is not to be considered as in any manner limiting the time during which the appointee is to serve—then there is absolutely no language at all in the Constitution telling us how long the appointee can sit. It is a mere matter of implication as to how long he is to sit. What words and what language has the Senate, by its repeated adjudications, read into this provision of the Constitution as a limitation upon his term? Simply that he shall sit until his successor is elected in the manner provided by the Constitution for the election of Senators. Having adopted that view, it was forced into adopting the rule that in no case could he hold beyond the final adjournment of the session of the legislature charged with the duty of filling the vacancy.

It seems reasonably to follow that if under the provisions of the amendment the governor should make an appointment, and the matter were then relegated to the elective constituency on a call for a special election, and that constituency for any reason failed to elect-as, for instance, if there was a tie vote in the election, or if the laws provided that a majority should be required in order to elect-and no one received a majority, the appointee would cease to hold after the election.

But however that may be, I think no one can resist the conclusion that the Senate read into this statute a provision, as though it were there substantially in words, that the appointee thus designated by the governor should hold until the vacancy was filled by election in the manner prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Montana overlooks the mandatory character of the last phrase of the paragraph with which we are dealing, which is as follows:

Which-

Meaning the legislatureshall then-

Meaning, at the next meetingfill such vacancies.

The words "such vacancies" clearly refer to the vacancies which happen by resignation or otherwise, and which for the time being have been filled by the governor. Those same vacancies, having been temporarily filled, must, under the mandatory provision of the Constitution, be filled by the legislature whenever it meets. Now, as I construe the provision of the Constitution, the words "until the next meeting of the legislature" are a limitation upon the power of the governor to appoint. He must appoint, if at all, during that interval. When the legislature is in session, however, if the vacancy has been filled in the meantime, the legislature must, under the provisions of the Constitution, fill that vacancy; and if it does not do so it fails to discharge a mandatory duty imposed upon it by the

While I grant you that it is not stated in express words, it seems to me the clear intendment of the Constitution is, that mandatory duty not having been carried out, that the temporary appointment made by the governor lapses.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator can not assign to that clause a significance as a limitation on the power of the governor and at the same time make it operate as a limitation upon the period during which the appointee can serve. I think the Senator will agree with me that if it is to be regarded as a limitation upon the time during which the governor can exercise the power, then there is absolutely no express language in the Constitution fixing the time during which the appointee shall

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no express language fixing it, as I have already said. It is fixed, as I believe, by the clear intendment of the Constitution, because of the reasons I have already suggested; but if you take the other view of the phrase "until the next meeting of the legislature," and say that qualifies the time, then it seems to me we must logically say that when the legislature meets the right of the applicant to remain in his seat at once ceases.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator that the right of the appointee does, as a matter of fact, terminate upon an election; but I insist that, if so, it is not by reason of any language in the concluding clause, provided the concluding clause limits the power to make the appointment, which is the accepted construc-Accordingly we must read some language into the Constitution in order to fix a limit upon the time during which the appointee can serve. I ask the question, What language has been read in there? There has been read in there the language that he shall hold his office until his successor is elected in the manner prescribed in the Constitution. His successor never can be elected by the legislature in the manner prescribed in the original Constitution. The sessions of the legislature no longer have any bearing at all upon the matter.

I think the clear meaning of the last clause of the amendment is, that Senator Jackson and others who might be holding by appointment should hold their seats until an election to fill the vacancy could be had in the States, respectively, from which they came in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. cordingly, Senator Lee's term began as soon as his credentials were presented here showing that he was elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Rayner. holding we do no violence to any language of the original Constitution, because upon the established theory of its mean-ing there is none such. The appointment was a temporary one, the "vacancy" not even being filled by it. The spirit of the fundamental law is fully met when the appointee is required to give place to a Senator regularly elected.

The Senator from Utah drew the conclusion, from the fact that there was a specific provisions in the statutes of the State of Maryland in relation to the nomination of a United States Senator, that the statutes to which I have invited your attention could not be regarded as sufficiently comprehensive in their terms to embrace that office. I wish to say a word with respect

It is true that there is a statute in the State of Maryland providing for the nomination of candidates for United States Senator. It was spoken of as a primary election. It is that variety of primary election that has been frequently resorted to for the purpose of defeating the hopes and aspirations of the people of the State for a real primary election. It provided, in terms, that at the general election on the second Tuesday after the first Monday in November the adherents of the respective parties might signify their desires in respect to their candidates for United States Senator, the result to be regarded as in the nature of an instruction to the members of the legislature, in the discharge of their duties at the next ensuing session, with respect to the election of a United States Senator.

Of course by the adoption of the seventeenth amendment Of course by the adoption of the seventeenth amendment those statutes became utterly void, nugatory, and useless. They were as though they had been absolutely wiped out by the act of the Legislature of the State of Maryland. Accordingly we are to construe the other statutes, which are comprehensive in their terms as though those statutes never had an existence at all. They are in effect as though they had read: That the nominations for candidates for all public offices except. United States Sepator shall be made in the manner. except United States Senator shall be made in the manner following, and then, subsequently, an act had been passed repealing the exception and cutting out the words "except United States Senator."

The uniform construction given to statutes of that character is that whenever an exception in a statute exempting a certain class from its operation has been repealed by the legislature, the statute thereafter is to be given exactly the same construction as though the exception never had been incorporated in the statute at all. Accordingly the Legislature of the State Maryland is to be deemed to have intended just exactly what its language expresses-that all public officers are to be nominated in the way therein indicated. We need not, however, concern ourselves with the nomination statutes of the State of Maryland, for it is very generally-in fact, I believe universally-held that without regard to nomination statutes the choice of the people as expressed at the polls must prevail. In other words, no matter how much has been the divergence from the requirements of the statutes in relation to nominations, any complaint to be effective must be made antecedent to the election. If no complaint is made, if no attempt is made by interested parties or by citizens to have the matter corrected prior to the election, complaint can not be successfully made about it thereafter. The candidate who receives the highest number of votes is entitled to the office whether he was nominated in accordance with the provisions of law or not, and of course even though there were no provisions of law at all in relation to nominations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana I think made a very clear statement that the sitting Member from Maryland held only during the vacancy and that if there had been no amendment to the Constitution that vacancy would have terminated when the legislature was convened and elected a successor. He has made it equally clear to my mind that under the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution that vacancy terminates when there is a legal election by the people under the terms of the seventeenth amendment. That being so, the only question I have in my mind is whether there is sufficient authority to be found in the statutes of the State of Maryland for an election to fill a Federal office such as that of a United States Senator.

I would be very glad if the Senator would again read the Maryland statute upon that subject. The Senator has made it ery clear to me that there is sufficient machinery provided for holding an election to fill a vacancy, but the Senator has not made it quite clear to my mind yet that there is authority in the Maryland statutes authorizing the election sufficiently broad to cover the case of a vacancy in a Federal office.

Mr. WALSH. I am not quite sure whether the Senator from North Carolina was here when I began to read the Maryland statutes

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not heard the Senator read that section of the statutes.

Mr. WALSH. I have called to the attention of the Senate practically all the statutes of the State of Maryland which

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think it is necessary to wait until a subsequent legislature prescribes a method for the holding of an election to fill such a vacancy if the authority of the existing statute is sufficient to cover the case of an election to fill a Federal office.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I thought the statutes of the State of Maryland about as comprehensive in their terms as language would permit, without specifically referring to the case of a United States Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if he will read it again. do not recall hearing him read that part of the statutes. heard him read the statute providing the machinery for holding elections in the State of Maryland, but I do not remember hearing him read the statute that authorized the holding of elections.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator that I believe the statutes ought to be construed as a whole, and I invited the attention of the Senate to the fact that they referred to all public offices without any restriction at all, and then lest any-body should attempt to restrict them at all, the legislature enacted section 120, which reads:

The word "election" as used in this article shall be construed to include elections had within any county or city for the purpose of enabling voters to choose some public officer or officers under the laws of this State or of the United States, or to pass upon any amendment, law, or other public act or proposition submitted to vote by law.

I submitted that there could have been no purpose in using that language, except anticipatory of the likelihood of the adoption of the seventeenth amendment by which United States Senators were likewise to be elected.

Mr. BRADLEY obtained the floor.
Mr. GOFF. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Johnson in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BRADLEY. I do.

Mr. GOFF. I desire simply to suggest the absence of a quorum before the Senator from Kentucky proceeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Smith, S. C. Ashurst Bacon Bradley James Johnson Jones Ransdell Smoot Stephenson Sterling Stone Sutherland Reed Robinson Root Kern Lane Bristow. Shafroth Bryan Chamberlain Chilton Lodge McCumber Martine, N. J. Sheppard Sherman Shields Thomas Thompson Vardaman Walsh Clapp Colt Nelson O'Gorman Shively Cummins Dillingham Simmons Oliver Overman Page Smith, Ariz, Smith, Ga. Smith, Md. Williams Gronna

The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Mr. SMOOT. Gallinger] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I make this announcement for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, in the few remarks that I shall make I will have but little to say concerning the points of argument presented by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], as I feel that he has completely covered that section of this controversy. I shall address myself to an entirely different proposition and which up to this time has not been discussed.

I will say at the outset that if this case is to be settled upon sentiment and not upon law my remarks will be very much out of place. It seems from the discussion that the absence of statutes amounts to nothing, the absence of authority amounts to nothing, and that at last the fact that the people have elected Mr. LEE as Senator from the State of Maryland is sufficient even if there were no statutes authorizing the election. In other words, that because the people have acted that is the end of it

I voted for the proposed amendment, and no Senator on this floor has more respect and admiration for the people than I. but I propose to show that the people never asked anything aside from the language of the amendment, that they expect nothing more, and therefore it is unnecessary for Senators to fall over each other in order to do something which they think may make them popular.

It was determined by the people that the old method of selecting United States Senators should cease. There was much discussion, both before and after the amendment was proposed, and during all of it no human being ever lifted his voice to and during all of it no numan being even and in any way contend that the proposed amendment should in any way affect the terms of Senators who were then in office. the people, therefore, through their representatives, ratified the amendment they spoke through the amendment. They did not speak outside of it.

No supposition can be indulged in the construction of a constitutional question. The Senate has the sole right to judge of the qualifications and election of its Members. It matters not what the Supreme Court of Maryland may have decided, it matters not what the opinion of the attorney general or of the governor of Maryland is, the only question for us to decide is what is the law, what is the Constitution, what are the rights of the people under that Constitution, and what are the duties of the Members of the Senate.

As I said, no question affecting the terms of old Senators was ever discussed. I will now call attention specifically to the language of that amendment:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the

I pause at this point to inquire what vacancies are referred Evidently the vacancies in the office provided for in the foregoing part of the amendment. Are we to say that in proposing and adopting this amendment, which changed the manner of selecting Senators, in speaking of vacancies the vacancies mentioned refer to the old Constitution? Certainly not. On the contrary, the vacancies mentioned are such as may occur in the terms mentioned in the amendment itself, not to those occurring in the terms of Senators elected under the old Constitution. We are forced by every rule of construction to conclude that these vacancies are such as may occur in the offices of Senators elected by the people.

Let us further examine whether the amendment has any affect upon the terms, or any part of them, of Senators elected under the old Constitution, which up to this time have not seen referred to either directly or by implication. Continuing, the amendment declares the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies,

To fill what vacancies? To fill vacancies in the offices of Senators theretofore elected under the old Constitution? Certainly not; but to fill vacancies in the offices of Senators elected by the people under the amendment. If we were to stop here the conclusion is inevitable that the vacancies referred to are not vacancies in the terms of Senators who were elected under tl.e old Constitution.

But let us read a little further:

Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

For a moment let us consider this language. The governor is to appoint. When is he to appoint? He is to appoint whenever the legislature empowers him to appoint. This is not a selfexecuting provision. He can not appoint until he is authorized to do so; and although he is ordered to call an election, he can not call that election until the legislature has directed the time, place, and manner of its holding. There can be no election until the legislature provides for it. There can be no appointment until the legislature empowers the governor to appoint. He would have just as much right to appoint under this section in the absence of power conferred upon him as he would have to call an election in the absence of one provided by the legislature.

It seems clear up to this point what the meaning of this seventeenth amendment is. But it was determined by the framers that there should be no loophole of escape, that there should be no chance for any misapprehension, and hence they added this significant language:

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

What plainer language could have been employed? What more direct words could have been used?

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid—and so forth.

Now, Mr. President, how can it be said that the election or the term of a Senator chosen under the provisions of the old Constitution can be affected by the amendment? Under the old Constitution the Senator was elected by the legislature. During a recess if there was a vacancy a temporary appointment was made by the governor to fill his place. When the legisla-ture met it elected a successor in the same manner in which the Senator was elected in the first instance.

And so we see the analogy that runs between these two laws. Under the seventeenth amendment Senators are elected by the people, and vacancies in their positions are filled by the people; under the old Constitution Senators are elected by the legislature and vacancies are filled by election by the legislature. Each is a complete system in itself. But, as said, the seventeenth amendment specifically provides that it shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it—the amendment—becomes valid.

There is serious doubt at least whether or not this body can pass a law regulating the election of Senators under the amendment. I will not take time to discuss that question. as it is not in issue here. But the people were determined upon one thing, and that was that the Congress of the United States should not have the power to fill a vacancy. They not only omit from the amendment directly or by implication the language of the old Constitution giving the Congress the right to legislate as to elections of Senators, but they absolutely prohibit it from filling the vacancies in the terms of Senators who are elected under the amendment. They vest that power especially in the people. The legislature is given the right to empower the governor to appoint, and is to provide by law for the holding of an election. The power having been specially conferred in this way, its exercise by any other agency is pro-

But we are told that the reason this clause was inserted was that otherwise the amendment might be construed that the old Senators were removed from their places. As already shown, such a construction is impossible from the language itself, even omitting the last clause.

How could anyone conclude that it was the intention of the seventeenth amendment, even if the saving clause were omitted, that the entire Senate of the United States should be turned out of office; that we should not have a single Member of this body; that the whole membership of the Senate should be swept out of existence until the legislatures had empowered the governors to appoint or directed an election; and during that time the wheels of the Government should stand perfectly idle? Such a contention would never have been made by any man of common sense; and if it had, would never have been entertained for a moment.

If that was not the object of the saving clause, as contended, then what was the object? We can not say that in formulating this amendment these words are mere surplusage; that they have no meaning whatever. We can not hold that they were intended to prevent some one from supposing that the whole Senate of the United States would be turned out. Then, what do they mean? They simply mean what they say—that this amendment shall not apply to the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution.

The circumstances existing at the time the amendment was framed constituted the reason for that clause. It was known by the proposers, as it was by those who ratified the amendment, that it was not absolutely certain that the amendment would be ratified. It was believed generally that it would be, but it was not absolutely certain, nor could the proposers have known how long it would take to ratify it. It had to be ratified by three-fourths of the States; and the men who drew this amendment knew that in some States the legislatures met annually, in some blennially, in some triennially, in some quadrennially; and hence they knew it would take a considerable length of time for the States to meet in their legislatures and ratify the amendment.

They not only knew that, but they knew it would take some time for the same reason for the States to legislate under the amendment for the purpose of electing Senators for the period of six years by the people. They knew, too, that during this time it was reasonably certain that there would be vacancies in the offices of the old Senators. All these facts were known to the framers and the people. Hence the Senators who drew the proposed amendment, for the purpose of giving time to carry it into effect, inserted the clause that it should not affect the election or terms of Senators chosen before it should become effective. This was done in order to prevent a chaotic condition, in order to avoid friction, and mostly and principally in order to prevent an interregnum in the office of a Senator from any State.

The proposers knew the history of the basis of senatorial representation. They knew the bitter controversy that arose in the Constitutional Convention as to that basis. They knew that to prevent any further trouble and to induce the various States to adopt the Constitution there was inserted in Article V the positive language that no State should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent.

They did not construe that article to mean alone that no State should be permanently deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate, but that it should not be so deprived for any time.

We now have a case before us from the State of Alabama. The late Senator from Alabama died in August. Since that date we have had the most important legislation in this body probably that ever was had before during the same length of time in any period of our history. And yet during all that time, if we are to construe this language as is contended, the State of Alabama has been deprived of one of her Senators and has been deprived of her equal suffrage on the floor of the Senate. It is true the same state of case does not exist in Maryland; but I am merely illustrating where the construction contended for will lead us, and I am attempting to show the reason that moved the Senators who proposed this amendment in inserting the saving clause in regard to the Senators chosen before the smendment to the Constitution became effective.

You will observe in the Maryland case the very peculiar force of the amendment in using the word "chosen." A Senator who is elected is chosen, but a Senator who is appointed is not elected. Therefore the framers undertook to cover the entire situation by employing a word that embraced both an election and an appointment. What is the term of the Senator appointed from Maryland? That term reaches from the time of his appointment to the election of his successor by the following legislature or until the adjournment of that legislature. Hence the purpose was to protect not only those who were elected, but those who were appointed as well, and to prevent any histus in the representation of a State during this time, giving to each State in the Union equal power and equal influence on the floor of the Senate.

It is attempted, however, to escape the meaning of this provision by saying that the word "affect" only means the lengthing or shortening of the term. What a ridiculous position! Here the term is fixed at six years under the old provision of the Constitution and also under the amendment. How can it be supposed that the word "affect" was used to prevent lengthening or shortening the term when its duration is fixed in both cases?

I have investigated very carefully the meaning of the word "affect." In the first place, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary says that the meaning of the word "affect" is "to act upon, to produce an effect or change." He gives as synonyms of the word, "influence, operate or act on, concern, move, overcome, impair."

Soulé in his work on synonyms gives the synonyms of the word "affect" as "influence on, act upon, work upon, concern." In Home Building Loan Association v. Nolan (21 Mont., 205) the meaning of the word was held to be "operate on, act upon, or concern."

In the case of Ryan v. Carter (93 U. S. S. C., 78) the Supreme Court of the United States construed the word "affect" as "having been used in the sense of acting injuriously upon persons and things. Such interpretation," said the court, "accords with the reason and manifest intention of the proviso, unsettles no confirmed title"—just as the construction here contended for—"and secures to the inhabitants the protection that Congress thought proper to afford."

In Baird v. St. Louis Hospital (116 Mo., 419) the court held that the word "affect" meant that the statute should not be so construed as to "prejudice or injuriously affect such rights."

In Conniff v. City (4 E. D. Smith, 430) the New York court held that the meaning of the word "affect" was "to act upon or produce a change."

In Clark v. Riddle (101 Iowa, 270) the court held that the meaning of the word "affect" was "to act upon or change."

In Holland v. Dickerson (41 Iowa) it was held that the use of the word "affect" was to prevent any change of preexisting rights.

At page 1159 of the Encyclopedia of Law and Procedure the general rule is laid down that the word "affect" means "to have effect upon, to influence; but often used in the sense of acting injuriously upon persons and things, and sometimes in the sense of 'vary."

According to these definitions, this amendment means that the election or term of any Senator chosen before the same became valid as a part of the Constitution shall not be acted upon, affected, concerned, enlarged, changed, prejudiced or injuriously affected, impaired, worked upon, varied, aimed at, influenced, or operated upon.

In other words, the meaning of the word "affect" is the meaning that is attached to it by the people generally. When the framers used that word, they used it for a purpose that would be understood by all; that is, that the terms should not be interfered with in any way.

The word "term" as employed in the amendment is purely impersonal. It relates exclusively to a period of time. If it had been intended otherwise, the Senate would have used the word "tenure." We can not for a moment suppose that the wise men who prepared this amendment did not know the difference in the meaning of the two words. They provided that the "term" should not be affected. Then, if the term shall not be affected, how can any part of it be affected? If the whole of it can not be affected, no part of it can be. The term is a unit, and is not susceptible of partition.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there can be no doubt of the construction of this section of the seventeenth amendment, and that the only way to prevent friction and trouble is to follow the old Constitution so far as the old Senators are concerned and the new Constitution so far as the newly elected Senators are concerned. In this way we will have no hiatus in representation and the wheels of the Government will roll regularly on.

We are told, however, that if this be done we shall be electing under two systems of government. Well, suppose we should. We proposed this amendment, and the people adopted it through their representatives. We could have made it specific if we intended something else. We could have made it self-executing; we did not do it. It is not the fault of the people of Maryland that this amendment is in the condition it is; and the appointments and elections will go on regularly as to the old Senators in supplying vacancies in their offices, and regularly as to the new Senators after they are elected, according to rules established in each instance.

Some of the Senators, however, seem to be exceedingly apprehensive that some State in the Union will not enact laws to carry out this constitutional amendment, when its legislature meets, and that therefore the will of the people of the United States will be disregarded. It has been said that in such a case there would be no remedy. I deny it. There is a remedy; an ample remedy. If at the proper time a State should have a meeting of its legislature, and the legislature should fail to enact such laws as are required to be enacted under the amendment to the Constitution to make it capable of enforcement, the remedy could be applied by the Senate refusing to recognize the man selected as Senator from that State.

The fact that elections are to be held at different times and under different sections of the Constitution does not affect the proposition. We are simply carrying out the will of the people, as expressed when they ratified this amendment; we are pursuing the language of the amendment itself in order to arrive at a proper conclusion.

Mr. President, allow me to present another proposition-Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes from the question on the construction of the word "term," if he will permit me, I should like to ask him a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says that the word as used in the amendment, is to be construed to mean length of time and is to be construed in a purely impersonal way. Grant that the word "term" is understood to mean the length of time for which the sitting Member was chosen and that that length of time was not to be affected by the seventeenth amendment, how does the change from electing a United, States Senator by the legislature to electing him by the people affect the term or the length of time? It affects the method of filling the term, but it does not affect the term or the length of time itself, as it seems to me.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I have taken the position—and that answers the question—that this amendment has no reference whatever to the term of old Senators, who were chosen prior to the time it went into effect. Therefore it can not affect their term; neither can it affect any part of the term, simply because it does not apply. The construction I am contending for has been adopted by the governor of every State of the Union. If the governors had thought that the meaning of this amendment was that in case of vacancies in terms of the old Senators there should be elections, they would have called their legislatures into special session for the purpose of enforcing it. Not a governor in the United States has called a special session of the legislature to enforce the seventeenth amendment, because they construe it not to apply to the terms or any part of the terms of the Senators who had been elected prior to the time when the amendment went into

Now, I wish to present another proposition, Mr. President. If my recollection is correct, Senator Rayner died in November, 1912. Immediately, or a very short while after his death, the governor of Maryland appointed Mr. Jackson as his successor under the old Constitution. Hence Jackson's rights vested under the old Constitution. After all this occurred the amendment was ratified in May, 1913. Then the governor proceeded to call an election under that amendment. To call an election for what? If he could call an election at all, he could only call it only when a vacancy existed. No vacancy existed in Maryland; that vacancy had already been filled by the appointment of Mr. What I mean to say is that there was no present vacancy, because Senator Jackson was filling out the portion of the term, which he had a right to do, until his successor was chosen by the legislature. Therefore I contend there was no right in the governor to call an election to fill this alleged vacancy, which was temporarily being filled and which temporarily did not exist.

The argument, however, is made that we do not need any statute to hold elections; that we can run wild, as it were, and the governor, whether there is or not any statute authorizing him to do so, can order an election, and that such an election will That may be a proper construction of constitutional law, but it does not agree with my opinion as to what its con-struction should be. I understand this to be a Government of law; that we are the judges of the qualifications and election of Members. But when we come to pass judgment upon their qualifications and election we do not exercise arbitrary power; we act within the law as it exists, and we have no power to go outside the law.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BRADLEY, Certainly.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says that the sitting Member from Maryland appointed by the governor filled the vacancy, and that, therefore, there is no vacancy in the office of Senator from Maryland. How long, under that appointment, does the Senator think Senator Jackson would be entitled to sit?

Mr. BRADLEY. I think he would be entitled to sit until the legislature which convened after his appointment elected his successor. If the legislature did not elect his successor and adjourned without any election, his term would necessarily end with the adjournment of the legislature. This has been the uniform rule adhered to by this body.

Mr. STONE. And that then there would be a vacancy?

Mr. BRADLEY. There would then be a vacancy.

Mr. STONE. Suppose the Legislature of Maryland did not pass any such statute as the Senator from Kentucky thinks ought to be enacted by the legislature of a State, then would there be a continuing vacancy, indefinite in length?

Mr. BRADLEY. Not by any means. The next legislature would fill the vacancy; but if the legislature failed to perform its duty and adjourned without filling the vacancy, then there would be no representation until the legislature met again.

Mr. STONE. Do I understand the Senator to say that the present Legislature of Maryland has power to elect a Senator?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. That it can elect him?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes.

Mr. STONE. And that he can be commissioned to come here? Mr. BRADLEY. I say so, because it is filling the term of a Senator elected before the seventeenth amendment went into effect; and it is filled just as it has always been filled during a recess by the governor's appointment, and, when the legislature meets, by an election by the legislature.

Mr. STONE. Then, if the present legislature should fail to elect, there would be a vacancy until another meeting of the legislature of the State?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes, sir. Mr. STONE. Which might not be, say, for two years—a new legislature?

Mr. BRADLEY. I mean until the end of Senator Rayner's term, of course.
Mr. STONE. The Senator means what?

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not mean that he would hold al-

I did not so understand.

Mr. BRADLEY. But I mean so long as Senator Rayner's term exists, there would be no representation, because, when the legislature adjourned, the sitting Member's power to act would cease and, the legislature having failed to elect, the State of Maryland would be without a successor to Senator Rayner by reason of its failure to act.

Mr. STONE. Until the next legislature met, as I understand the Senator?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. STONE. That might be a year or two years away; and that legislature when it assembled would have power, notwithstanding the seventeenth amendment, to elect and commission a Senator for the full term of six years, it might be?

Mr. BRADLEY. Oh, no; I do not say that. I contend that the legislature would have the power to elect a Senator to supply the vacancy in the term of Senator Rayner.

Mr. STONE. But that vacancy might have then expired.

Mr. BRADLEY. Well, that would be the end of it; and the election would be held under the amendment by the people if his term had expired. The old provision of the Constitution has nothing to do with that; but the amendment steps in, and takes its place, and the people elect his successor.

Mr. STONE. I think I see.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, returning to this slipshod way of holding elections, we are referred to the case of Hoge in Pennsylvania. In that case the governor issued a writ of election only two days before the general election; Hoge was elected a Representative in Congress; and when he came here it was decided by the House of Representatives that he was entitled to his seat. There is a very great difference between that case and this. In that case there was a statute of Pennsylvania fixing the time, manner, and places of the election of a Representative in Congress. That election was held on the day fixed under the machinery and in the way pointed out by the statute. Hence it was that the House of Representatives ruled that Hoge was entitled to his seat; but in this case there is no statute-I quite agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. Suther-LAND] as to that—providing for the election of a United States Senator in the State of Maryland. Consequently, when the governor called a special election he called it without any statute authorizing him to do so or any statute fixing the time, places, or manner of holding an election for United States Senafor.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, I am still curious. thought I understood the Senator, but I am not sure now that I do. I think I understand the Senator to say that, so far as the present term, the Rayner term, so to speak, is concerned, the legislature would have a right to fill that vacancy. If they failed to do so at their present session and there should be another session of the legislature before the expiration of the Rayner term, the legislature could fill the remnant of that term by an election to the Senate; but if it should happen that when the next session of the legislature assembled the Rayner term had expired, the Senator says the legislature then would not have the power to fill it, but that the vacancy would have to be filled by an election by the people under the seventeenth amendment of the Constitution. Am I correct as to that?

Mr. BRADLEY. It would be held if there were any law to authorize it; but if there were no law of the State to authorize it, it would not be held, and the vacancy would continue until the legislature had fixed the time, place, and manner of holding an election.

Mr. STONE. But there could be no election and the vacancy could not be filled unless the Legislature of the State of Maryland made some provision for holding an election?

Mr. BRADLEY. That is my position exactly. make such provision, then the vacancy would be filled by the people, while if they did not make it, it would be their own fault and due to their own negligence.

Mr. STONE. I now understand the contention of the Sen-

Mr. BRADLEY. Returning to the discussion-I shall detain the Senate but a very short while-concerning the case from Pennsylvania. In that case there was a statute providing for the election of Representatives in Congress. In the State of Maryland there is no statute providing for the election of a United States Senator, though there is a statute providing for the election of Representatives in Congress. The governor of the State is merely an executive officer; he has no legislative power; he can not make laws; he can not supply the absence of a statute; he can not arrogate to himself the power to call a special election simply because he is governor of the Commonwealth. He must act within the law, and his only power is to execute law, not to make it

There is one point I have overlooked which I desire to touch upon. Suppose that one of the old Senators had died the day immediately preceding the day on which this amendment became valid and there was no statute in such State providing for a special election. If the construction contended for by the majority is correct, the only remedy would be for the governor to call a special session of the legislature to procure the enactment of a statute directing an election. Suppose that legislature should decline to empower the governor to make an appointment for personal or political reasons. The time consumed in giving notice of the meeting of the legislature, the time consumed by the legislature in enacting the law, the time consumed in giving the notice of election, in holding the same, and in the certification of the result would be, in all, four months. During all this time the State would be deprived of her equal suffrage in the Senate. We can not believe that the proposers of the seventeenth amendment intended any such result as this.

Mr. President, I have heard something about "the Republican governor of Maryland." The fact that he is a Republican governor neither adds to nor detracts from him. There is no political issue in this case. I am in favor of seating Mr. Glass, a Democrat from Alabama, because I believe the governor had the right to appoint him. I am opposed to seating Mr. Lee, a Democrat, because I believe the election was null and void and was held without any authority. Therefore, whether the governor of Maryland is a Republican or a Democrat amounts to The simple question is, What is the proper construction of this law?

I regret that the majority of the committee differ with me. I have a high respect for each of them. I have tried to satisfy my conscience that their conclusions were right; but under my oath to support the Constitution of the United States I can not do it, because I think their conclusions lead to a direct violation of that sacred instrument.

Consequently I have made a minority report. Whatever the result may be in the Senate, I shall feel that I have at least conscientiously and honestly discharged what I believe to be my duty

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit merely a brief statement concerning this case. It is not my intention to detain the Senate by a prolonged argument.

The seventeenth amendment, changing the manner of choosing United States Senators so as to provide for their election by the voters of the States instead of by the legislatures, is, unfortunately, ambiguous in so far as its provisions relate to the filling of vacancies. Senators and lawyers generally who have devoted attention to the subject differ radically in their construction and application of the terms of the amendment as to the filling of vacancies in the terms of Senators chosen before the amendment became valid. These ambiguities and varying constructions have occasioned much discussion, which has not relieved the confusion surrounding the subject.

The States of Alabama and Maryland have been deprived of the services, respectively, of Senators Johnston and Rayner, both of whom were chosen before the amendment became effective. The Senate being the only forum having jurisdiction to determine the election and qualification of its Members, and being widely divided upon the subject, these two States have been compelled to construe the amendment for themselves, and to provide for filling these vacancies according to the judgment of those in authority in the respective States. It so happens that in Maryland it was determined that a special election was the proper method of choosing a Senator to fill the vacancy in Senator Rayner's unexpired term occasioned by the death of that Senator, and that in Alabama the governor, under the best advice he could obtain, decided that the old method was applicable in selecting Senator Johnston's successor, and that the duty of making a temporary appointment of a successor to Senator Johnston devolved upon him.

I have heretofore expressed the opinion, and supported it by arguments which seemed to me to be worthy of consideration. that, considering the seventeenth amendment as a whole, and other provisions of the Federal Constitution which have more or less direct relation to the subject, a special election is not contemplated in filling vacancies in terms where the initial Senators were chosen before the amendment was adopted. I still adhere to that opinion. However, many Senators take a different view of the matter. It appears that Mr. Lee was chosen in an election called by the executive authority of Maryland; that this election was acquiesced in and participated in by the persons most directly interested in the result, and by the people generally; that the election was fairly conducted; and that Mr. LEE is the choice of the people of Maryland for Senator; and he is so certified by the governor of the State of Maryland as both the governor's choice and the people's choice.

The exercise of the utmost fairness and good faith in the manner of selecting Mr. Lee as Senator seems to be generally admitted.

Taking into consideration the provision in the Federal Constitution that no State shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent, it would seem unfair to the State of Maryland that Congress should draw an amendment in such ambiguous form as to be unable readily to define its meaning or to determine its application, and by a mere ambiguity override the fundamental principle of equal representation in the Senate for all the States, and thus accomplish what could not be done even by an amendment to the Constitution. In view of all these circumstances, it would seem to be fair, inasmuch as neither the amendment nor any act of Congress has defined the procedure clearly, to acquiesce in and accept the action of the State when admittedly taken in good faith. It would seem unfair to make Mr. Lee and the State of Maryland the victims of our own stupidity, if you please, in preparing and submitting to the people of the United States an amendment about which even lawyers in the Senate can not agree, and concerning the meaning of which we ourselves proceed to quarrel as soon as it has been adopted.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I will state that the Senator elect, Mr. Lee, is present and ready to be sworn in.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator elect will present himself at the desk and the oath of office will be administered.

Mr. Lee of Maryland was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. SMITH of Maryland; and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That the Hon. BLAIR LEE, a Senator from the State of Maryland, be appointed chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Senator Vardaman as such chairman on August 14, 1913.

COOPERATIVE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2091, known as the agricultural extension bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed House bill 7951, which is almost identical with Senate bill 3091. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has favorably reported the House bill with an amendment. I move to substitute House bill 7951 for Senate bill 3091.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that after the substitution is made the bill will be open to amendment?
The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is not, I desire to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippl?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do. Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia to explain the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill for which he offers it as a substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The first change made by the House bill is, on page 2 of the Senate bill, line 23, where in the House bill three words are omitted which appear in the Senate bill. They are the words "or his representative." The effect of that change is simply to require that the Secretary of Agriculture himself shall agree to the plans prepared by the representatives of the colleges of the respective States, rather than to permit one of his representatives to pass upon the question.

The next change is a change of verbiage on line 21.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On what page?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 3. It strikes out the word additional," in line 21, and adds, after "$3,000,000," "in addition to the sum of $480,000 hereinbefore provided for."

That is no change in the meaning of the bill, except to make the bill perfectly clear that the $3,000,000 additional each year was to be stationary when reached, and not to increase beyond $3,000,000. It makes it perfectly clear that the subsequent annual appropriations are to be $3,000,000 annually in addition to the $480,000.

The next change in the House bill is a verbal change on page 4, line 14, after the word "of," following the word "maintenance," the word "the" is inserted, so that it reads:

For the maintenance of the cooperative agricultural extension work. And, after the word "work," the words are added "provided for in this act." So that is a mere verbal change.

The next change in the House bill from the bill we have before us consists in striking out section 4.

Section 4 provides:

That there shall be in the Department of Agriculture a director of cooperative agricultural extension work, to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture—

And so forth.

After further consideration of the measure it was determined that no such official position was required, but that as now organized the Department of Agriculture is amply able to care for the subject, and a still further reason existed why it was deemed best to leave out this newly to be created office. There is a plan for a considerable change in the organization of the Agricultural Department, and it was therefore thought best that no more statutory positions should at this time be created in the depart-

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has not the Senator from Georgia overlooked a very important change in the House bill when comparing it with the Senate bill? I refer to the proviso in line 15, on page 2.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is right. It was not marked on the copy that I was holding. I will call attention to it. On page 2 the proviso is changed and another proviso is substituted. The Senate bill contains simply this proviso:

Provided, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made in such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct.

The language added is:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to discontinue either the farm management work or the farmers' cooperative demonstration work as now conducted by the Bureau of Plant Industry of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BACON. If my colleague will permit me, I think, before going into those details, we ought to settle the status of this measure before the Senate. I understood my colleague simply to desire to call up the House bill and have it take the place on the calendar of the Senate bill. If that is his purpose, then the House bill will be before the Senate and will be open to amendment and to all these corrections. If it is offered now as a substitute for the Senate bill-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not my motion and that is not my purpose.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator's purpose to be, exactly as he states now, simply to have the House bill take the place of the Senate bill on the calendar. I think that ought to be decided first, and then the bill will be before the Senate for the same action as that to which the Senate bill would be

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, my motion was not to substitute the substance of the House bill for the substance of the Senate bill, but to substitute on the calendar the House bill for the Senate bill. I was asked to explain the difference between the two measures, and I was responding to that request before the matter was passed upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand it, what the Senator from Georgia really intends to do is to take up the House bill from the calendar and proceed to consider it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate has already taken up Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate has already taken up the Senate bill. That was the bill with reference to which I gave the notice, and the notice was pending before the House bill was passed by that body. My motion is to substitute the House bill on the calendar for the consideration of the Senate in place of the Senate bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to substitute the one bill for the other

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Exactly, for consideration.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Would that result in the indefinite postponement of the Senate bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know what would be the effect on the Senate bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inquiring whether that is the purpose of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am told by older parliamentarians, Senators of longer experience here, that it will not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That depends on what the purpose of the Senator from Georgia is, not on what older parliamentarians may think. Then the motion of the Senator from Georgia is simply to substitute the House bill on the calendar for the

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My purpose is to substitute for imediate consideration by the Senate the House bill for the

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to substituting upon the calendar the House bill for the Senate bill and proceeding to the consideration of the House bill? The Chair hears none. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 7951.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress the United States Department of Agriculture, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 3, line 20, after the words "sum of," strike out "$300,000" and insert "$600,000," so as to read:

Provided further, That there is also appropriated an additional sum of $600,000 for the fiscal year following that in which the foregoing appropriation first becomes available, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say that when this bill was before the Senate a few days ago for discussion, I proposed an amendment increasing the additional appropriation it provided for the first year and for each succeeding aine years from $300,000 to $500,000, and increasing the ultimate appropriation—that is to say, the amount to be appropriated at the end of nine years—from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000. This amendment was pending when the bill was laid aside.

Since that time the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate.

Since that time the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate has reported a proposed amendment, which I am advised by the Senator from Georgia he will offer, increasing the initial appropriation from $300,000 to $600,000, and annually increasing the appropriation by that sum for the next four years, making the ultimate appropriation $3,000,000. That change on the part of the committee, though not all I would wish, is very gratifying to me, and I shall not now renew the amendment which I offered when the matter was formerly before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator from North Carolina noticed that when the committee increased the annual appropriation from $300,000 to $600,000 it decreased the number of years through which the appropriation was to continue to four years?

Mr. SIMMONS. To four years, but-

Mr. CUMMINS. So the total appropriation provided for in the bill as now reported is no greater than the total appropriation provided for in the bill to which the Senator from North Carolina offered his amendment. The only difference is that we reach the $3,000,000 amount sooner under this amendment than we would have reached it under the bill originally brought in. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will persist in his amendment so that the total appropriation will ultimately be $5,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had not overlooked the fact stated by the Senator from Iowa. The total amount that will be appropriated at the end of four years under this bill is not as large as I would like to have it. I would like to see the additional sum of $600,000 a year continued until it reaches at least $5,000,000, as proposed in my amendment. But, as a matter of adjustment and compromise, I was disposed to accept the amendment offered by the committee, and my reason for that, I wish to state to the Senator, is that it has occurred to me from the beginning that the material matter in connection with this appropriation is to secure a larger sum for immediate use than the original bill provided.

I have not considered the amount of the ultimate appropriation as being of quite as much importance as the immediate appropriation, because I think the farmer is just now in greater need of this information and demonstration instruction than he will be at the end of 6 or 10 years. In other words, I think it is more important to have $600,000 a year now instead of $300,000 than it will be at the end of 10 years to have $5,000,000 instead of $3,000,000, and for the reason I shall state.

In other words, Mr. President, my idea is that the farmer just at this time stands in great need of the accumulated information of the department with respect to modern agricultural methods-and the quicker we could get it to him the better-and I think it is not a bad swap to abate the ultimate amount to be appropriated to secure a larger immediate appropriation, and therefore, by way of compromise, I have indicated to the Senator from Georgia my willingness to accept the proposition now proposed by the committee. Although it does not give all I desire, it gives more for the first three or four years, when, I think, the urgency will be greatest, than my amendment provided. At the end of that time, if the total amount appropriated is not sufficient, the situation could be met by supplementary legislation.

I do not think, speaking relatively, that the farmers will be as much in need of this demonstration work 10 years hence as they are to-day.

I felt that the farmers could reasonably afford to exchange a reduction of the ultimate appropriation for a larger immediate approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and appropriation, because now is the time when they most need this instruction and because before the appropriation made under the old bill reaches $3,000,000 and before that under this bill reaches $3,000,000 the farmers will have become so thoroughly familiarized with all the information and methods of modern culture that they will not need quite so large an increase in the ultimate appropriation provided in the original bill as they now need an increase in the initial appropriations.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa, however, that if he sees fit to move that amendment I shall vote for it, because I am in favor of it, and I am simply accepting this by way of compromise and adjustment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not care to suggest an amendment if the Senator from North Carolina intends to offer one on the subject. If he does not offer one, I intend to offer an amendment to strike out "four" and insert "seven"; that is, that this contribution shall continue seven years instead of four years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has expressed some views with reference to this measure with which I do not agree. I do not agree with his view that we will not need later on a substantial sum to continue this work.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator has not understood me to say that we would not need it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not desire at this moment to eld. I think I will correct any misapprehension the Senator The Senator expressed a view that it was very important to increase the sum at present, and perhaps more important to have it now than later on, because he hoped or thought that 10 years from now as much would not be needed as is needed now. It is to that view of the Senator that I express my dissent.

With reference to the increase of this appropriation the facts are these: Two years ago this measure was brought before the are these: Iwo years ago this measure was brought before the Senate and the effort then was to begin with $300,000 a year and increase $300,000 each year. Under that bill $900,000 would have been appropriated year after next. By delaying the passage of the bill we have lost those two years. After conference with those very familiar with the subject I believe we can easily find trained men ready year after next to handle an appropriation of $600,000 from the Government and $600,000 from the States. It was not necessary to begin with as small a sum as the original bill provided.

a sum as the original bill provided.

It is not simply, Mr. President, a question as to how much is now needed to do good work. It is a question of the colleges being able to obtain thoroughly trained men to do the work. We do not wish to begin this work with any except thoroughly trained men to do it. When the first bill was introduced two years ago, it was then felt that $3,000,000 a year or $6,000,000 a year spent throughout the country on this work would be splendidly spent if we had the trained demonstrators, the men prepared to go from the colleges into each county and do the teaching that we desire done; but we doubted finding the men prepared for the work. It would be extremely unwise to press selections faster than the trained men were found to do the

It was upon that idea that the presidents of colleges and the Department of Agriculture thought two years ago we should begin with only $300,000 from the Government and $300,000 from the States; but as two years have passed, and as much attention has been given to this subject throughout the States, and as men have been training for this work, and as more men have been prepared by the Department of Agriculture and the colleges of agriculture for the work, the opinion is that we can easily handle $600,000 from the States and $600,000 from the Government, and that we can advance at the rate of $600,000 a year instead of $300,000 a year.

If the Senate desires to enlarge this appropriation beyond $3,000,000, there is an exceedingly easy place to make the change. The bill as reported adds $600,000 a year for four years. If that word "four" is changed to some larger sum, that would accomplish the result. I think $600,000 a year from the States and $600,000 from the General Government is about as fast as we will be able judiciously to handle the fund. If the Senate wishes to increase the amount, I think the best way to do it would be to continue the $600,000-a-year increase a few Then we would simply substitute for the $3,years longer. 000,000 the figures produced by the appropriation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia will not have forgotten that I suggested that, if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons] did not offer any amendment to the bill to correspond with the one which he offered to the Senate bill, I intended to offer an amendment striking out the word "four" and inserting "seven," which would then carry the appropriation during a period of seven years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not hear the suggestion of the

Senator

Mr. CUMMINS. I entirely agree with the Senator with regard to the propriety of making the increase gradually, and I think $600,000 each year is quite rapidly enough.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Two years ago the figures selected were not selected at haphazard; they were the result of careful consideration. This time we began the bill with the same language, but after conference and investigation we were satisfied that it was not necessary to start with so small an amount. We are two years farther along in the work of the colleges, in the work of demonstration through the Department of Agriculture, and in the selection and training of men fitted to do this work, and it was the opinion of the department, as well as of others with whom I consulted, that we could change the bill, and, beginning with $600,000, advance at the rate of $600,000.

When the bill was before the Senate a few days ago, I was opposed to any substantial amendment on account of the status of the House bill, and I yielded readily to permitting the bill to go over in order that the House bill might come to us and that we might make such changes in the House bill as we might desire; for if the House should not accept our amendments, of course we can go to conference, and we will at least get as much as the House has sent us. I am sure the Senate is for that much, and I hope we will be able to get more.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Georgia seems to have misunderstood my position as stated to the Senate. Probably I was unfortunate and did not make myself very clear. I had not meant to say, because I do not believe it, that $3,000,000 at the end of 5 years or of 10 years would be adequate or that the first annual appropriation of $300,000 would be adequate. I think both inadequate, and I also think $600,000 for the first year increased until it reaches about $5,000,000 in seven years would still be inadequate. I myself would personally like to see the appropriation both in the beginning and at the end of the annual increases larger than originally proposed by the committee, or than was proposed in the amendment which I offered when the bill was previously before the Senate. But it is not a question of what I want, but a question of what I can get.

I understood from the Senator from Georgia that probably the House might stand for an annual additional sum of $600,000 for four years, making it in the end an ultimate appropriation of $3,000,000, although they probably might not be willing to stand for a greater ultimate sum than that. What I want is results, and I do not care to have the Senate pass a bill which probably will not be accepted by the House. What I meant to say, therefore, in my first statement was that I was more anxious that the appropriation during the next few years should be considerably increased over the original figures of the Senate committee than I was as to the ultimate amount that the appropriation would reach, because I think the emergency for this instruction and demonstration work is greater now than it will be probably 5 or 10 years hence. I base that con-clusion upon the idea that this character of instruction going on during 8 or 10 years will naturally familiarize the farmer with modern methods, and probably at the end of that time there will not be the same necessity for instruction that there is now, although, of course, Mr. President-and I did not mean to say to the contrary—we expect those who are at the head of the Agricultural Department in the Nation and those who are at the head of our agricultural colleges in the States to continue to evolve new methods and new systems and that the farmer will always be in need of instruction as to these new methods and discoveries.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I am still in favor of an ultimate permanent appropriation for this purpose of $5,000,000, and if the Senator from Georgia does not think that the increase from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 will seriously interfere with the passage of his bill, I should like to offer the amendment, because I think it ought to be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the present status of the bill, it could not interfere with it. The bill would go to conference, and if we do not get from the House the amount desired, according to the terms of the Senate bill, we can come back here and recede if it be necessary. We are perfect masters, I think, of the situation. The reasons I gave on a former occasion for my objection are not applicable now, and I am perfectly willing, so far as I am personally concerned, to accept the sevenyear provision as suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall, in view of the statement of the Senator, renew my motion to increase the permanent appropriation. I felt somewhat hampered about it, in the first instance, because I thought possibly the Senator from Georgia might think I had had an understanding with him that I would not make it, but in view of his last statement I do not feel bound by any supposed understanding between the Senator and myself, and I will make the motion for an increase.

DEATH OF HON. SHELBY M. CULLOM.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I regret to announce the death of Shelby M. Cullom, for 30 years a Senator from Illinois. He departed this life this afternoon but a short time ago. I shall be unavoidably absent, and would like to ask leave of the Senate to be absent, that I may attend the funeral services.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Leave of absence will be granted, without objection.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not know that I ought to make a motion in view of the fact that the agricultural extension bill is now before the Senate, but the announcement which has just been made, it seems to me, comes with peculiar force owing to the fact that by it we learn of the death of a man who devoted the best years of his life to the service of his country in this Chamber. It seems to me that that announcement having been made the Senate ought to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the sad tidings have just come to the Members of the Senate of the death of ex-Senator Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois. He was so recently and for so long a time a Member of this body that I move the Senate do now adjourn in honor of his memory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 29, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Help us, we beseech Thee, to think clearly, act nobly, and worship Thee in the beauty of lioliness, that we may reflect the image of our Maker in our character. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

WOOLGROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed the report of the committee on resolutions at the fifth annual convention of the National Woolgrowers' Association, held at Salt Lake City, January, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the Record the resolutions of the National Woolgrowers' Association. Is there objection? Mr. BORLAND. I object.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the consideration of the bill H. R. 1739, the Alaskan railroad bill, is again reached it will be in order for the Committee on Territories, in lieu of the House bill, to call up for consideration and for report Senate bill 48—to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railways in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposesunder the same limitations for general debate as apply to the House bill.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire of the gentleman, if that consent is granted, will the bill be published so that by next Wednesday we may have the Senate bill, together with the amendments that were added to it in the Senate?

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senate bill will be printed immedi-

Mr. HOUSTON. The Senate bill will be printed immediately after this consent is granted.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I desired to know—

Mr. HOUSTON. It will be referred to the Committee on the Territories and printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is the gentleman correct about that?

If he substitutes the Senate bill—

Mr. HOUSTON.

We do not propose to substitute it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then would it not be better to keep it on the Speaker's table and have the usual number of copies printed?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That was what I was going to suggest, and not have it go to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it would be better to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Territories, that the committee may consider it and make amendments if they deem it necessary. They will have ample time to do this before the bill is reached again.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems that this is rather an unusual request, asking those who are opposed to this legislation to expedite its passage by unanimous consent, to advance it in this rather unusual manner, when we are opposed to having it written into law. I do not see how we can consistently agree by unanimous consent to do something that we hope the House will not do by a vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman objects, let me make this suggestion: The House and Senate are both considering the same subject matter, in the form of a House bill in the House and a Senate bill in the Senate. I do not recall a case since I have been in the House where it has not been permitted to consider the Senate bill as it came to the House or in the Senate to consider the House bill if it came to the Senate first. It must be quite evident that if objection should be made it would clearly be the duty of the Committee on Rules to report rule, because otherwise there would be a delay in the consideration of matters and a duplication of consideration utterly unfair to the House and to the Senate. I hope the gentleman from Wyoming will not object. The House will then vote on the propositions involved.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. As I understand, this means the substitution of the Senate bill for consideration from

Mr. MANN. After to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a usual thing, and it is entirely proper, for gentlemen who are vigorously and earnestly opposed to legislation to put forth every effort to delay its enactment. Furthermore, so far as I am concerned, I hope to have an opportunity to speak to-day. I have never read the Senate bill; I have no idea what it contains, and I could not make a speech upon a bill which I have never read and that I know nothing about. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bills S. 832, S. 833, and S. 834, each granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain sol-diers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sallors, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, and move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unant-mous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bills S. 832, 833, and 834, omnibus pension bills of similar titles, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, and move that the House insist upon its amendments to these bills and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Messrs. Adair, Russell, and Langham.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the House automatically will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Alaska railroad bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1739, the Alaska railroad bill, with Mr. Harrison in the chair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair kindly inform us how much more time remains for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Something over eight hours, and there are 31 applications for time.

Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that it stands at 8 hours and 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. A little over eight hours. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. Humphrey] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that it is the intention of the Chairman to recognize me at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Washington?
The CHAIRMAN. That is the intention of the Chair.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, as my time will be limited, and I have agreed not to occupy the entire hour, I will ask that I be not interrupted, especially upon anything that may lead to any controversy. I believe I will be able to answer more questions by being permitted to proceed. I do not want to be discourteous, but I want to cover the ground to as great an extent as possible.

As a resident of Seattle for more than 20 years, I am proud of the part that she has taken in this great contest for the building of railroads in Alaska. The people of Seattle have done more than the people of any other community to bring to the attention of the country and Congress the riches, the resources, the promises, and the needs and rights of Alaska. is true Seattle will profit by the construction of railroads in Alaska, but she has earned her reward. Seattle has expended thousands of dollars in bringing this great Territory to the attention of the people. But for the work of Seattle this legislation would not at present have been possible. While Seattle has been working for herself she has been working for the benefit of the entire country, and especially has she been working to help the long neglected, helpless, and outraged people of Alaska. Seattle deserves and will receive the sincere thanks of every resident of that mistreated Territory.

It is especially fitting that Seattle, the first city of the great Northwest, should play a leading part in the development of Alaska. It was the Territory of Washington, by its patriotic and far-sighted pioneers, that caused the first action to be taken in the negotiations that finally led to the acquirement of Alaska. As a resident of the State of Washington, I am proud of that fact. In the year 1866 the Legislature of the Territory of Washington adopted a memorial in regard to Alaska, then a Russian possession, asking the President to negotiate certain fishing privileges along its shores, and asking that ships be sent to explore and survey its waters. That resolution is as follows:

To his Excellency Andrew Johnson, President of the United States:

To his Excellency Andrew Johnson,

President of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, beg leave to show that abundance of codfish, halibut, and salmon of excellent quality have been found along the shores of the Russian possessions. Your memorialists respectfully request your Excellency to obtain such rights and privileges of the Government of Russia as will enable our fishing vessels to visit the ports and harbors of its possessions, to the end that fuel, water, and provisions may be easily obtained, that our sick and disabled fishermen may obtain sanitary assistance, together with the privilege of curing fish and repairing vessels in need of repairs. Your memorialists further request that the Treasury Department be instructed to forward to the collector of customs of this Puget Sound district such fishing licenses, abstract journals, and log books as will enable our hardy fishermen to obtain the bounties now provided and paid to the fishermen in the Atlantic States. Your memorialists finally pray your Excellency to employ such ships as may be spared from the Pacific naval fleet in exploring and surveying the fishing banks known to navigators to exist along the Pacific coast from the Cortes Bank to Berling Straits; and as in duty bound your memorialists will ever pray.

This memorial was the first step in the acquirement of Alaska. It was on its presentation to President Johnson, in February, 1866, referred to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State brought it to the attention of Mr. de Stoeckl, the Russian min-The Secretary also sent with it a communication urging the importance of some early arrangement between the two countries that would prevent the growth of any future difficulties or misunderstandings. Immediately thereafter negotiations between the two countries followed that led within a short time to the purchase of Alaska by the United States. Certainly the people of the State of Washington have reason to feel that they have ever been the friends of Alaska, and that to-day they stand in a position where they are entitled to press her rights and her claims upon Congress and the people of the

EARLY HISTORY.

Alaska has a most romantic history. It was one of the few lands that came to Russia by right of discovery. The same master genius that made Russia a mighty empire was the one that caused the discovery of Alaska-Peter the Great. Peter himself had worked in a shipyard and had with his own hand been a shipbuilder. While his own land was shut out from the ocean his thoughts turned toward the sea. Even in that early day Russia was struggling for a port on the Pacific. Other nations of Europe at that time were pushing their campaigns of conquest. Peter the Great with his own hand penned an order directing his chief admiral to send an expedition to Kamchatka, and there or at some other place construct "one or two boats with decks." These boats were to be used for exploring the coast to see whether Asia and North America were contiguous. This expedition was also directed to inquire as to the situation of the coast and to keep an exact journal of their proceedings. The great Czar died in 1725, but Empress Catherine followed faithfully the wishes of her illustrious husband in this matter.

Under the command of Vitus Bering, a Dane and a navigator of experience, the expedition started by laud on the 5th day of February, 1725, upon their long journey across Siberia and northern Asia for the far-off Pacific shores. This is one of the remarkable land expeditions of history. At one time the members of the expedition were reduced to such extremity that they ate their boots, straps, and leather bags to save them from starvation.

It was on the 20th day of July, 1728, or over three years, before the party was ready to embark in one small vessel upon their exploring expedition. On this trip Bering discovered one of the islands now a part of Alaska, but did not touch the mainland. He became satisfied that Asia and America were separated. Again he set out by land journey for St. Petersburg. which he reached once more in March, 1730, after an absence of over five years. Something was accomplished for Russia by this expedition, and the illustrious leader had engraven forever his name upon the maps of the world. Russia was not satisfied, however, and another expedițion is reported to have been made under the command of a navigator named Gwosdem. It is said that he reached some of the islands on the Alaskan coast.

Bering again volunteered to lead another expedition, and although this expedition was ordered in 1732, it did not leave the attnough this expedition was ordered in 1432, it did not leave the eastern coast until June 4, 1741. On July 18, 1741, Bering first saw continental Alaska in latitude 56° 28'. This was almost under the shadow of Mount St. Elias. Bering says, "The country has terribly high mountains, covered with snow."

The other ship of this expedition, becoming separated from the one commanded by Bering, sighted the same coast on the 15th of July, 1741, in latitude 56°. This vessel was in command of Capt. Tschirikow. He anchored some distance from the steep and rocky cliffs and sent his mate with 10 men in the longboat The boat entered a little cove, and after waiting a conashore. siderable time, as the men did not return, the commander, thinking the boat might have been injured, sent the small boat with carpenters to look for it. The small boat disappeared in the cove. The captain saw from his ship a great smoke rising from the shore in the vicinity in which his boats had gone, and shortly two boatloads of savage natives came out near the ship and then put back to the cove that had been entered by the doomed sailors. The captain did not know the fate of his crew, but was powerless to help them. Neither boats nor men were ever thereafter seen or heard from. This is one of the many grim tragedies that were so frequent in the days of the early discoveries. This occurred somewhere near Sitka. The cap-tain, after indescribable hardships, having lost 49 of his 70 men, reached Kamchatka on October 9, 1741, and thence returned

Commodore Bering's ship was caught in terrible storms and was driven about by its fury for 17 days. At last the ship was dashed ashore on an unknown, unoccupied, barren island. Scurry came upon the men with all its horrors. Here upon this Here upon this lonely island, sheltered in a shallow ditch, his body half covered with sand in an attempt to keep from freezing. December 7, 1841, died the great sailor Bering, one of the heroes of history. This lonely island became his burial place. Russia, in ceding the Territory to the United States, most fittingly retained this last resting place of her great explorer.

There were some four other discovery expeditions sent out by Russia. When it came to ceding Alaska to the United States it was found that Russia's title by right of discovery was beyoud dispute.

The earliest settlement in Alaska seems to have been made on Kodiak Island in 1790, where a Russian company was established under a Greek named Delareff.

ALASKA, THE "GREAT LAND."

In ending his great speech in the United States Senate in favor of the Alaska purchase Senator Sumner used these words:

words:

As these extensive possessions, constituting a corner of the continent, pass from the Imperial Government of Russia they will naturally receive a new name. They will be no longer Russian America. How shall they be called? Clearly, any name borrowed from classical history or from individual invention will be little better than a misnomer or a nickname unworthy of such an occasion. Even if taken from our own history, it will be of doubtful taste. The name should come from the country itself. It should be indigenous, aboriginal, one of the autochthons of the soil. Happily such a name exists, which is as proper in sound as in origin. It appears from the report of Cook, the illustrious navigator, to whom I have so often referred, that the euphonious name now applied to the peninsula which is the continental link of the Aleutian chain was the sole word used originally by the native islanders "when speaking of the American Continent in general, which they knew perfectly well to be a great land." It only remains that, following these natives, whose places are now ours, we, too, should call this "great land" Alaska.

And thus it was named. Since then facts have proven that

And thus it was named. Since then facts have proven that this is indeed the appropriate name. Alaska is the "great land" far beyond what even the great brain or the prophetic vision of Charles Sumner foresaw. Alaska is the land of mighty things, of infinite resources, of measureless wealth, of limitless opportunities.

SIZE OF ALASKA.

If you were to place the map of Alaska on that of the United States, while the southeastern end would touch the Atlantic the western end would touch the shores of the Pacific; its southern border would rest on Mexico and its northern border on Canadian soil. In our North American possessions Seattle is the center, geographically, east and west. In other words, it is as far west from Seattle to the extreme end of the Aleutian Islands as it is east to New York. Alaska in area is five hundred times larger than the State of Rhode Island and more than ten times larger than either Pennsylvania or New York. It is larger than 20 States of the Union combined. It is greater than Norway, Sweden, England, Scotland, and Ireland together. It is larger than Germany, France, and Spain combined. Alaska contains the mightiest mountain peaks of North America. It has the second greatest river in all the world in extent of continuous unobstructed natural navigation, exceeded only by the Amazon. It has a river that during the summer contains more fish-and these of the highest grade-than any other river on earth. Along its shores are found more fish than in all the other waters of the world combined. Government reports declare that on its banks to-day there are one thousand codfish for every one that ever was upon the far-famed banks of the northern Atlantic.

Upon Kodiak Island is one of the wonders of the world. Upon Kodiak Island is one of the wonders of the world. I had the pleasure of spending more than two months upon this island a few years ago. A little stream, the Karluk, is less than 25 miles long and only a few feet wide, yet at the company of t of this small river are annually taken more than $3,000,000 worth of salmon as they come up from the sea to enter it, and still enough of them escape the fishermen's nets to so crowd this stream, on their way to the spawning ground, as to make it difficult to run upon the river canoes and rowboats.

Mr. SLOAN. Quite a fish story. [Applause.]
Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Alaska has an inexhaustible supply of coal. It has more gold, more copper, more furs, and more fish than any other country on the globe.

In scenic beauty it is the wonderland of the world. Crossing the White Pass Railroad, and then more than 2,000 miles down the Yukon, touching the Arctic Circle under the midnight sun, and then to the mouth of this wonderful river in the Bering Sea, is one of the interesting trips of this earth. When a railroad is built reaching the Yukon in Alaska this will become within the next decade one of the most popular summer trips of the tourist, and much of the wealth now expended in Europe by the pleasure seekers of this country will be more profitably expended in this land of the north and bring to the traveler greater pleasure and more fascinating experiences. The trip from Seattle to southeastern Alaska by the inside route, more than 1,000 miles in channels from a few miles to a few yards and most rugged pictures of mountain and sea that can be seen anywhere from the deck of a steamer. All of this trip is made through water as quiet as a deep inland river and is never marred by storm or troubled sea. In fact, this is the only trip I have ever been able to make on salt water and never become unhappy.

CLIMATE.

Although Alaska has been an American possession for almost 50 years, ignorance of its climate is still widespread and astonishingly prevalent.

I may say that some of the gentlemen opposed to this bill apparently have not attempted to enlighten the committee on this proposition. You can just as well step out in the cloakthis proposition. For can just as wen step out in the croak-room and look at the weather map and see it is below zero in Minnesota and come back and say you could not raise oranges in Florida because it is in the United States as to say that it is cold in southeastern Alaska because it is in northern Alaska.

To many of our people Alaska is synonymous with icebergs, eternal snows, and fur-enshrouded, shivering Eskimos. This general impression is always strengthened by looking at the map, many forgetting that distance north or south of the equator is not always an accurate measure of temperature. Fairbanks, with a winter climate as pleasant for human habita-tion as New England, possessing all the comforts of modern life, lies 1,500 miles north of New York. It is north of Labrador and 300 miles north of the southern end of Greenland. The average temperature of Nome, on the Bering Sea, during the winter is the same as that of Montreal.

The great interior of Alaska south of the Yukon River has a rainfall of 12 to 20 inches. It has a temperature in summer that sometimes reaches 90 in the shade and sometimes falls as low as 60 to 70° below zero in winter. But what we generally term "dryness of the atmosphere" makes these extremes of temperature far less trying than a climate of much less variation on the Atlantic coast. It is the universal testimony of tion on the Atlantic coast. It is the universal testinony of those having had the experience that a winter at Fairbanks or Tanana or Circle City is no more disagreeable than one in Maine, Minnesota, or Manitoba. Between this great interior region of vast valleys and plains and the Pacific coast are mighty mountain ranges. But these present no greater obstacle to the construction and operation of a railroad than do the Cascade Mountains in the United States.

The whole coast of Alaska washed by the Pacific Ocean has a moderate winter and summer climate. The winter climate of Wrangell, Juneau, Skagway, or Kodiak is as mild as that of the city of Washington, while Sitka is warmer, the lowest temperature ever recorded there being 4° below zero.

The summer climate of southeastern Alaska is mild and en-tirely free from storms and winds; in fact, the summer climate of coastal Alaska is almost ideal—a continual delight—as dif-ferent from the torrid and debilitating summer heat of our National Capital as the climate enjoyed by Lazarus was dif-ferent from that endured by the rich man. On all the coast of Alaska bordering on the Pacific from Ketchikan to Dutch Harbor there is not a deep harbor but what is always free from ice and always opened to navigation.

The mountain regions furnish none but the ordinary barriers to the construction of railroads, while the difficulties in the interior region are no greater than that on our western plains,

I do not deem it necessary to go further into details regarding the physical or climatic conditions of Alaska, as what I have already said shows that the proposed railroads and the boat lines connected therewith at their ocean terminals can operate every day in the year. In other words, when the proposed rail-road is completed a trip can be made from Seattle to Cordova and from Cordova to Fairbanks with the same regularity and with the same comfort that a trip can now be made from Cordova to Seattle and then from Seattle to Spokane.

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman permit a question? Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; although I had requested that I be not interrupted.

Mr. FRANCIS. As to the climatic conditions and values in Alaska, I would like to understand why they have only 32,000 white population, and that is all that has gone in there since 1867?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will answer that as I go along. I anticipate that most of the questions that might be asked will be answered by me.

Mr. GOULDEN. Just one question. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the lowest and highest temperature at Fair-wide, often at the very base of mountains rising sheer from the water's edge thousands of feet, down the perpendicular sides of which dash countless streams, is one of the most magnificent drops as low as 50° or 60° below zero in the winter.

WHAT ALASKA HAS COST.

In the beginning we were to pay Russia $7,000,000 for Alaska, but there were certain companies having certain claims and privileges, and the United States, in order to extinguish all these claims and have a clean and perfect title, agreed to pay $200,000 additional, so that the purchase price of Alaska was $7,200,000. The obvious considerations for that purchase at the time are summed up by Senator Sumner in the speech heretofore referred to in the following statement:

The interests of the Pacific States; the extension of the national domain; the extension of republican institutions; the foreclosure of adverse British possession, and the amity of Russia.

At the time of the purchase Alaska was referred to by many public men as "Seward's folly," and many believed that the expenditure would never bring adequate returns; just as to-day we still find some who think that Alaska will not justify the expenditure of $35,000,000 for the building of railroads to develop it. Since we have purchased Alaska, in addition to the original price paid the Government has expended for various other public purposes in the Territory about $29,000,000, or Alaska has cost in all about $36,000,000. About one-half of this amount has been returned to the National Treasury directly by Alaska; so that to-day, all told, this Nation has invested in Alaska less than $20,000,000. Think of that sum in comparison with what the Philippines have cost us and then think what we have done for the Philippines have done for the Philippines and what we have done for Alaska and what is proposed to be done for Alaska now. If the white man in Alaska during the last 10 years could have received but a fraction of the assistance the brown man in the Philippines has been given, Alaska would be paying annually many millions and we would not have had in that Territory a population whose loyalty to the flag is to be measured by the number of American soldiers in sight, and whose gratitude is in inverse ratio to the favors received. What have the people of the United States received from Alaska in return for the $20,000,000 invested? What wealth has Alaska added to the world since the flag of the United States went there? Since 1867 Alaska has produced as follows:

More than $200,000,000 in gold. More than $150,000,000 in fish. More than $75,000,000 in furs. More than $10,000,000 in copper.

To say nothing of other products. In all, she has produced more than $500,000,000. It has given more than $25 for every one paid by the Government. Surely, in view of this showing, we can afford to invest a little more Government money in that

And remember that this vast sum of $500,000,000 has been produced by but a small number of white inhabitants. For several years past the annual production of Alaska has been more than $40,000,000, and this in spite of the fact that its resources have been locked up as absolutely as it was possible for the authorities to do, with an utter disregard for both law and justice. This vast wealth has been produced by a population containing but 35,000 white inhabitants. This is probably by far the greatest per capita production of any country in the world and demonstrates the natural wealth and great resources of Alaska. And this wealth, as I have stated, has not only been produced without Government aid or encouragement, but in spite of lawless Government interference and opposition and under circumstances that would have brought discouragement and complete ruin to any other land. With the building of railroads there will within the next 10 or 15 years certainly come to Alaska not less than 250,000 people. Her annual production will not be less than $300,000,000. The output of gold alone will surely not be less than $100,000,000 a year. These figures are not only conservative, they are far below what every present fact and circumstance would warrant.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will have to refuse to

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. GOLD,

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Basing my predictions upon known facts, I believe that Alaska will not only produce more gold during the next 50 years than any other country but in all probability that she will produce more gold than all the rest of the world.

Generally speaking, Alaska may be divided into 12 great gold districts, based upon the discoveries already made. This does not include many small fields that have been worked to some extent. Four of these fields are near the seacoast in southeastern Alaska, seven are in the interior, and one faces on Ber-

The most important on the Pacific side is the Juneau ing Sea. region. There are at present in this field four great producing The Treadwell group has been producing for many years. They have produced a total of about $55,000,000 up to They- estimate that their annual productions hereafter will be between five and six million dollars. Their ore runs in richness from $2.50 to $3 per ton.

Near the Treadwell group is the Alaska Gastineau mine. Between four and five million dollars has already been expended in getting this mine ready for operation. This will be, when completed, the largest mine in the world, so far as the amount of ore used is concerned. The ore will be low grade, running about $1.50 to the ton. The capacity of this mine will be 20,000 tons per day. They expect to produce, when running at full capacity, about $10,000,000 per year.

The Alaska Juneau mine is another group that will handle about 12,000 tons of ore per day. Its annual production, it is estimated, will be about $6,500,000.

The Ebner group estimate that their annual output will be about $4,000,000.

The total annual output of these four mines within the next four or five years will therefore be over $25,000,000. This will make the Juneau field the second largest gold-producing region in the world, and yet all of these mines are situated within 5 miles of each other in the center of a ledge 25 to 30 miles long, 500 feet wide, and running up to 2,000 feet above sea level. How far it goes below the sea no man knows.

The Treadwell ore has increased in richness gradually with the depth of the mine.

In estimating that the future output of this region will be $25,000,000 per year, I have not taken into account that other mines may be established along the 20 miles or more on the same vein, containing practically the same kind of ore. Each of those now there that I have mentioned have in sight suffi-cient ore to run them at full capacity for 100 years. One of the great mining engineers of the world has said that the amount of ore in this Juneau region is practically without limit and its value beyond computation. And yet how little the people of the United States know of this marvelous region and of its stupendous riches. You do not find much about it in the popular magazines—too much gold and too little scandal. The facts concerning it can only be had from technical mining journals.

The next region on the coast includes the mines near Ketchikan, at Berners Bay, Eagle River, and Chichagof Island. All these mines are producing, but the output I do not know, although it is not large.

The next field is around Prince William Sound. Here there are two or three producing mines. These mines are small, but the prospects are very favorable, the ore being far richer than that in the Juneau region.

The Willow Creek district is situated 30 miles from tidewater. In this field is to be found some of the most promising gold mines in Alaska, but the transportation problem so far has prevented much development.

There has also been considerable mining done in years gone by on Kodiak Island both in the ledges and along the beach. There is little, however, being done there at the present time.

INTERIOR REGION.

The greatest of the interior regions measured by our present knowledge is that great section lying between the Yukon and Tanana Rivers. The vastness of this region may be better understood when you know that it is approximately 400 miles long and 100 miles wide. This region has already produced $75,000,000. In this vast region everywhere is found in immense quantities gold-bearing gravel. Its inaccessibility makes impossible the working of any but the very richest. None can be profitably worked to-day that carries less than $1 a square yard. The average so far has been $3 per yard. It is a conservative estimate that there is ten times as much gold in the low-grade gravel below $1 a yard as there is in the gravel that will produce above that amount. This gives you some conception of how much this region may produce, after transportation facilities are provided, from the gravel already known, especially if you will but remember that that gravel has already produced $75,000,000 from gravel that averaged $3 to the yard, and that in California gold is now being profitably produced from gravel bearing only 6 cents per yard. The prophecy of mining men that the now known gravel in this great region will in the future years produce a billion dollars seems to be based on a certain foundation. But this region is no richer or greater in its gold-bearing gravels than it is in its gold-bearing ledges. These ledges contain unlimited quantities of ore, some of them of great richness, but in this interior region some ores from gravel bearing only 6 cents per yard. The prophecy of develop it.

known to contain $20 to $25 per ton remain untouched because its inaccessibility makes it unprofitable to work. In many places in this great gold field ore containing less than $100 per ton can not be mined. And yet remember that while this rich ore containing $20 to $25 to the ton under present conditions is of no value, still on the seacoast at tidewater ore carrying $1.50 a ton is being worked with profit, and the only difference between this rich ore inland and the low-grade ore at Juneau is the difference in transportation facilities.

Out of this great region between the Yukon and the Tanana alone will come enough gold every year, after reasonable transportation facilities are established, to pay in full the amount expended by the Government in the construction of all the railroads in Alaska contemplated by this bill. Many mine experts claim that this region will prove to be the greatest mining region in future years in the world. A man who has had the actual experience of constructing and operating railroads in Alaska and who knows this great gold-bearing region from personal knowledge and who is as well qualified to give an opinion as any living man told me the other day that if the Government would give him a lease on the gold properties in this field for a period of 50 years and charge him a 10 per cent royalty, that he could secure $75,000,000 in 60 days to build railroads to

In this region to-day are found the towns of Fairbanks, Hot Springs, Rampart, Eagle City, Fortymile, and Tenderfoot.

NORTH YUKON REGION.

The known gold-bearing region north of the Yukon contains about 30,000 square miles. It has produced about $5,000,000. This region has gold-bearing gravel and ledges of enormous extent, but only the bonanzas can be worked, owing to its remoteness and the tremendous cost of transportation. This region will not be penetrated, but it will be touched and greatly assisted by the proposed railroad. In this section are found the camps of Coldfoot, Wiseman, and Bettles.

IDITEROD REGION.

The Iditerod district contains only about 5,000 square miles. It has produced about $15,000,000. Like the other regions of the interior already mentioned, it contains everywhere goldbearing gravels and ores. This region is handicapped, as are the others, because of inaccessibility, but it will be penetrated and greatly helped by one of the proposed railroads.

MOUNT M'KINLEY REGION.

The Mount McKinley or Bonnifield district contains about 20,000 square miles. It has produced about $1,000,000. This field will certainly have a rapid development after the construction of the proposed railroads, as it will be cut into by one of the great trunk lines. Its gravels are similar to those of the other interior districts. Its gold-bearing ledges are the greatest that have yet been found in all of Alaska. No other region in the Territory promises greater results or more rapid development from the building of the railroads. This region contains the greatest coal fields of Alaska. Nothing but transportation is needed to develop the wonderful riches of this wonderful district.

THE CHILLISTONE DISTRICT.

The Chillistone district is a small one, containing only about 100 square miles. It has both gold and gravel ledges. been producing about $250,000 per year. Lack of transportation alone prevents its development.

SLATE CREEK.

The Slate Creek field has an area of 1,000 square miles. Its production has been small, but it contains very extensive tracts of gold-bearing ledges and gravel. Owing to the lack of transportation facilities and its remoteness, its ledges can not be worked at all and only its richest gravel.

CHISANA.

The new Chisana district is very similar to the Slate Creek district. It is destined to develop great riches if it can but secure transportation facilities. Under present conditions its production is small.

SEWARD PENINSULA.

The regions that I have mentioned complete the list of the best-known gold fields of Alaska, except those on the Seward Peninsula. These are among the greatest of the Territory. This region, however, contains only about 15,000 square miles. It has one of the richest fields in all Alaska, and has already produced $70,000,000. The gold-bearing gravel of the Seward Peninsula in extent is about the same as that of California. Some think its ultimate production of gold will equal that of California. Two-thirds of all that this region has produced has come from a little crescent-shaped stretch of sea beach at Nome, about 25 miles long and 2 or 3 miles wide. Mr. F. A.

Richards, of London, a very eminent engineer, estimates that this small crescent-shaped strip will give an average yield of 25 cents per cubic yard. The average yield for the three dredges now at work there during the past season was 50 cents per cubic yard. If Mr. Richards's estimate is right, then this beach at Nome alone contains a billion dollars. There are many gold-bearing ledges on the Seward Peninsula.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman point out the location of Nome on the map?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is here at the point I indicate. I have tried to sketch in brief outline the promised riches in gold that Alaska holds. The tidewater mines along the Pacific coast are a factor to be considered in the construction of railroads into Alaska, for with the railroads built, the coast cities built up by these mines can get their coal from Alaska for much less than they now get it, when they are compelled to purchase it from various parts of the world.

There is also a factor to be considered in regard to freights, not only on the railroads but also in relation to water transportation lines. To some extent the development of the interior may also enter into the question of the future food supply of the seacoast communities.

But the vast riches of the great interior regions must remain locked up and of no value until the railroads come. Only the most meager development can possibly take place without them. At Johannesburg, in South Africa, $170,000,000 in gold is being annually produced from ore running $8 per ton. Countless millions of tons of far richer ore is already known to exist in the interior of Alaska. Johannesburg lies 500 miles from the seashore, in a barren, sun-scorched desert. It has to import all of its fuel, its timber, and its food.

In mining gold at Coolgardie, in Australia, situated in a waterless, treeless waste, the entire water supply is pumped from wells situated 350 miles away.

Alaska possesses every advantage over Johannesburg in producing gold from ore except transportation and cheap labor. Out on the coast of Alaska millions are being taken from ore that runs from $1.50 to $3 per ton, while in the interior an almost unlimited amount of ore running from $5 to $25 per ton can not be worked. The sole difference between these interior regions and Juneau is one of transportation. There is no gold field in the whole world where gold can be taken from the ore under conditions as favorable as those in Alaska, except only California. There are millions of acres of gravel in the interior of Alaska containing from 25 cents to $1 per square yard of gold that can not be touched to-day solely because of the lack of transportation. Yet, in California, fortunes are being made from gravel bearing 6 cents per yard.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. For a brief question.
Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman has used the expression square yard." Does the gentleman mean square yard or cubic

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I mean cubic yard.

With railroads in Alaska transporting supplies at a reasonable rate, there will be many Treadwells spring up in the interior, and it is probable that another Johannesburg will be duplicated, while from the gravels will come more of the precious minerals than California has yet produced.

To the public mind gold mining is a transient business, surrounded with romance and glamor, and suggests only sudden great riches. It is true the bonanzas are short lived, produce prodigiously for a time, attract great attention, and then end. But this is only the romantic side of gold mining and furnishes but a small part of the world's great gold supply. Generally speaking gold mining may be called a permanent business. California has been producing gold for 64 years and taking her total production last year gives its average quota about $20,-000,000. It is also worthy of note that out of 75 counties in California, 35 of them last year produced gold.

Gold mining in Spain has been carried on continuously for a thousand years, and it is reported that the mines of Solomon are again to be worked.

Of course, no man can mathematically measure what the gold production of Alaska will be under proper development, but if we can forecast the future of Alaska by the history of the other gold-producing regions of the world, then it seems certain that with a reasonable system of transportation and with those who go there to develop her mines receiving the same encouragement and assistance that men have received in every other part of the earth under similar conditions that within a few years the production of gold in Alaska will be $200,000,000 annually, and that this production will continue for a century to come.

Shall we now hesitate to commit the Government to spend a sum that is a mere pittance compared with the wealth that the return upon it promises? Wealth in its most attractive form, for which, from the dawn of civilization, nations and men have dreamed, struggled, and suffered, have endured every hardship and privation, dared every danger and obstacle, defied every law, endured every anguish and agony, betrayed every trust, violated every obligation, worshiped and cursed every god, perpetrated every cruelty, and committed every crime.

COPPER.

Around Prince William Sound and along the Copper River, all forming one district, is one of the largest, if, indeed, it be not the largest, copper region in the world, both in extent and richness of its ore. The mines on Copper River are not producing, owing to the lack of transportation facilities either to ship their ore or to secure coal to smelt it. The Kennicott and Beatson, the Elmar, and the Midas are all producing mines and all are situated at or near tidewater. There are also other mines that operate.

Last year the value of the copper produced by the Alaska mines was $5,000,000. It is most remarkable that they produced anything. Only the richness of the ore and being located on tidewater made it possible. Here in this region we have the only known copper mines on earth located at the ocean's edge.

A few years ago I visited the Beatson mine. We walked up the hillside a few rods from the beach. There we saw the face of a great cliff, solid copper ore, millions of dollars worth in plain view. The miners placed the ore in small tramcars. These cars were then released and they ran by gravity to the side of an ocean steamer-something that can not be duplicated in all the world except in Alaska. These mines on Prince William Sound ship about 4,000 tons a month. Part of this is shipped to Tacoma, 1,200 miles, where is meets coal brought from the Atlantic Ocean, 12,000 miles, which is used to smelt it. Some of this ore is brought to Seattle, 1,200 miles, then shipped by rail 3,000 miles to New Jersey to be smelted, yet the coal for smelting this copper is within a few miles of the copper mines producing it. But for seven years any man who even dared suggest that Alaska coal be used for this or any other purpose has been regarded generally by Government officials as an undesirable citizen and immediately suspected of being a criminal, and was, indeed, fortunate if he escaped with his reputation and without being prosecuted.

Under such conditions only high-grade ore, even when mined at the side of an ocean-going ship, can be handled. No Alaska ore giving less than 200 pounds of pure copper to the ton is used. Even ore this rich is handled but little, and only that giving 300 pounds or more is generally shipped.

In Montana, Utah, and Arizona ore giving 40 pounds to the ton is worked with profit, and yet the natural conditions for producing and handling ore in Alaska are more favorable than in any of the States named. Alaska has equal advantages in the way of coal for smelting and better advantages in the way of transportation.

There can be no question that the building of the proposed railroad will be the direct cause of great copper production in this region. Transportation will produce the only thing necessary to handle the copper ore with great profit, and that is coal. Experts who have given the matter attention predict that within a very few years Prince William Sound will become one of the great copper-producing centers of the world. They believe that on its shores within the next 15 years will be a city containing a population as great as that of Butte, Mont., and producing as much copper. We may call this a dream, but the facts known demonstrate that it is almost certain to be a wonderful reality.

OTHER MINERAL RESOURCES.

Petroleum has been found in many parts of Alaska, the bestknown region being the Katalla fields, near Comptroller Bay. This region contains about 100 square miles and is producing in considerable quantities, sufficient to meet local uses. The oil is of the highest quality, having parafine bore. This type of oil, of which gasoline is a product, is constantly becoming more valuable.

Tin occurs in many places in Alaska, both as placer tin and in lodes. On the Seward Peninsula alone tin is said to occur over an area of more than 450 square miles. There are many other places in Alaska where tin is found. The official report says that Alaska exported in 1912 $90,831 worth of tin.

Iron has been found in several places in the Territory, but under present conditions none has yet been found that can be profitably worked.

Mercury occurs along the Copper River Valley and in the Iditared regions. It has also been discovered in the Kuskokwim Valley Lead has been discovered in the Ketchikan district, and also on the Seward Peninsula, but none of it has been mined.

Antimony of high grade has been found in the Seward Peninsula and in the Chitina Valley, being associated with native gold. It is, however, of practically no present value, owing to the absence of smelting facilities.

Platinum has been found in small quantities in the sluice boxes of the many placer camps. It is probable that this very valuable metal will be found in considerable quantity when the country is more thoroughly explored.

AGRICULTURE.

When you ask what are the agricultural possibilities of Alaska, the best possible answer is to see what has been done in other parts of the world under similar conditions. We have a most striking and convincing example of what may be done in Alaska in what has been done in the countries of Norway, Sweden, and Finland. Take the map of these countries and put it on the map of Alaska and you will find that their combined area is about four-fifths of that of Alaska. The latitudes are identical. The general climatic conditions are almost the same. The southern part of Sweden has some land along the coast that is probably better for agricultural purposes than any in Alaska. On the other hand, the great territory in Alaska along the Copper and Tanana Rivers is far better for agricultural purposes than any of the interior portion of either of the three countries named. In these European countries the interior is largely mountainous, and there is nothing that compares with the great stretch of territory of low and comparatively level land in the valleys of the Yukon, the Kuskokwim, the Copper, and the Tanana Rivers, and their tributaries.

In all the European countries mentioned there are about 6,000,000 acres under cultivation and a like amount in grass or pasture, making in all 12,000,000 acres of agricultural land in the three combined.

In Alaska there are a hundred million acres of the same character of land under practically the same climatic conditions, or more than eight times as much.

Prof. J. W. Neal, of the Department of Agriculture, after a reconnoissance survey, reports that in the valley of the Tanana alone, including tributary valleys leading therefrom, there are 9,700,000 acres of agricultural land, or an amount two-thirds as great as all of the cultivated and grass lands combined of Norway, Sweden, and Finland.

In view of these comparisons in size and climate of agricultural lands, it is interesting to note what these three countries of northeastern Europe have done in the way of agriculture with one-eighth of the land suitable for this purpose that Alaska possesses and of no better quality. Their annual crop, judged by that of 1906, is approximately as follows:

Wheatbushels_	6, 200, 000
Ryedo	29, 500, 000
Barleydo	21, 900, 000
Oatsdo	97, 000, 000
Potatoesdo	95, 500, 000
Haytons_	5, 934, 000

In the same year these countries possessed the following live stock:

ı	Horses	1, 056, 000 5, 214, 000
1
1		3, 319, 000
1	Hogs	4, 118, 000
1	Goats	368, 000
1	Reindeer	584, 000

Of course, it is not contended or expected that the agricultural products that will be produced in Alaska within a few years after railroads are built will be eight times as great as those of the countries named, but it certainly should within a reasonable time, with eight times as much land, equal that which these countries produce.

which these countries produce.

These countries have about 10,000 miles of railroad. I have been informed that 80 per cent of the freight traffic of these railroads consists of coal and wood, mostly coal, and all of it imported. Think of the great handicap in the way of fuel that these countries are under as compared with Alaska with its inexhaustible coal supply!

They have a population of 10,000,000.

Seward, Cordova, Valdez, and Skagway are along the sixtieth parallel of north latitude. They are mere villages. Along the same parallel is found Christiania, with 200,000 population; Stockholm, with 275,000; and St. Petersburg, with over 2,000,000.

But to continue the comparison between Alaska and the Scandinavian Peninsula. While the conditions for agriculture, except in the amount of land, are practically the same, here the equality ceases. In all other resources, except timber and water power, there is no comparison. In its fisheries Alaska surpasses those of these countries beyond all computation. There is no coal, no copper, and no gold in these countries. In all these Alaska is perhaps as rich as any other portion of the world. Alaska is what may be termed "a country of remarkable balance." It has diversified resources widely scattered. Gold and coal are found over a vast area. This fact must not be overlooked in considering the development of Alaska, and especially its agricultural resources. When a gold camp is established, especially of low-grade ore, or a copper mine opened up, near them will always be found coal to furnish the heat and light and power. Around these mines a town or city will spring into life, and around these towns are agricultural lands that will produce the vegetables, the grain, and the live stock to largely meet all local demands. Each of these industries wait on each other and all wait on transportation. The very moment that the products of the mines can be economically transported, that moment all Alaska problems are easy of solution. All that will then be necessary will be for the Government to remove the ban now placed on private enterprise in Alaska and treat the people of that Territory as it treats its citizens in other parts of its domain and Alaska will develop and prosper beyond the hopes of its most enthusiastic friends. All over Alaska will spring up towns and vilages, their inhabitants engaged in wresting from the earth its wealth of copper and gold. Around each of these communities will be found gardens and fields and meadows.

In the development of Alaska agriculture will wait on mining. Here lies the great value of Alaska from an agricultural standpoint. Alaska will not raise for many years to come products to help feed the rest of the world, but she can largely feed her Alaska in the development of her inexhaustible mineral wealth will be largely self-sustaining. Her coal mines will furnish the light and the heat, her forests the timber, her fields and her waters most of the food. It is true that agricultural products for many years to come will directly furnish but little of the tonnage of her railroads; indirectly it will play a great The mines will furnish most of the tonnage in Alaska, as they do in the United States. Even in agricultural portions of our country agricultural products are but a small part of the railroad freight. Only 14½ per cent of the total freight on the Great Northern Railroad, an agricultural road, is agricultural products. Mining products furnish 381 per cent of all its Only 181 per cent of the freight hauled by the Burlington Railroad is made up of agricultural products, while 63.77 per cent is furnished by the mines. It is estimated that 50 per cent of all the freight tonnage in the United States comes from

REINDEER.

I believe that the reindeer is destined to be one of the great factors in the future settlement and development of Alaska. well remember 20 years ago, when Dr. Sheldon Jackson first talked of getting reindeer for Alaska. It was treated very facetiously by most people. It is quite natural for the human species to mistake their own ignorance for ludicrous actions in others. A small herd of reindeer was sent to Alaska in 1892. A small nerd of reindeer was sent to Alaska in 1892. As a recall, this was partly paid for by private contributions. All told, 1,280 head have been sent into Alaska. This number has now increased to over 38,000. The herd has a value of $930,000. The total income has been over $200,000, and this does not include the 3,700 owned by the Government. The 24,000 owned by natives brought them last year a return of $44,885 in additional to the state of $40,000 owned by natives brought them last year a return of $44,885 in additional to the state of the properties. tion to the meat and hides that they used themselves.

The total amount so far expended by the Government in relation to the reindeer has been $292,000. Certainly this has been a most wise and paying investment, when it is remembered that these natives constantly require support from the Government. There are literally millions upon millions of acres in Alaska suitable for raising reindeer. All that great portion of the Territory around the Kuskoquim River is especially fitted for this purpose; also the great territory in the Seward Peninsula; in fact, almost anywhere in Alaska. It would be a modest estimate to say that 10,000,000 reindeer could find room to feed in Alaska on land that will probably never be used for any other purpose. animal can be raised, and no feeding or shelter is required, either winter or summer. They appear to thrive best in winter and to grow fattest at this time from the moss they dig from under the snow. There are countless thousands of wild reindeer in Alaska to-day, generally called caribou. Herds of caribou consisting of from two to three hundred thousand are often reported, while herds have been seen, according to most reliable witnesses, containing more than 1,000,000.

The reindeer is destined to not only help settle the question of a food supply in Alaska, but it is also an animal that can be raised in Alaska and sold to the outside world. The meat is of high quality. A good many carcasses of reindeer could be shipped to the Pacific Coast States now if some adequate provision was made to properly handle and slaughter the animals. The supply has already outgrown the local demand, and the a number each year. Last October, when I was in Seattle, this meat brought from Nome was on the market and sold readily at good prices. Here is a promise of an almost inexhaustible meat supply, and the demand for it is practically without limit.

It is imperative, however, that there should be a change in the system of raising reindeer in Alaska. Up to this time only natives, the missions, the Lapps, and the Government have been permitted to own or raise reindeer. The time has come when this system must be changed. White men must be permitted to engage in this industry. When the white men commence the raising of reindeer, then will come proper methods of breeding and herding.

To raise this meat-producing animal costs nothing, winter or summer, for feed or for shelter—the only cost is in herding. With modern methods sure to be introduced if the whites are permitted to engage in this business, I regard as certain that Alaska will in the future send this choice meat, as she now sends her fishes, to every part of the world.

COAL FOR THE NAVY.

One direct benefit that would come to the Nation by the construction of these railroads in Alaska would be to furnish coal for the Navy. To-day we send coal from the Atlantic to the Pacific for the use of our Navy. This costs a million and a quarter annually more than it would if the Navy used Pacific coast coal. This coal is carried in foreign ships, manned mostly by Chinese crews. These foreign vessels in the beginning carried coal for the Government for from $3 to $4 per ton; but, as the American vessel has now entirely disappeared, these foreign vessels fix the rate by agreement, and at present the charge is from $6 to $8 per ton.

This use of foreign vessels is in direct violation of the law. The Government openly violates here a law that it compels its citizens to obey. By this disregard of the law it has succeeded in placing the Navy Department absolutely in the power of this foreign monopoly. These foreign ships take their coal to the Pacific coast, discharge it, and are then turned loose to become legalized pirates, by the direct act of the Government, to destroy the legitimate shipping of the Pacific. But the commercial side of this transaction is not the worst side. In time of war these foreign ships could not be used to carry coal for our American ships for this purpose do not exist. If hostilities should come upon the Pacific coast, the Navy would be useless and helpless if it has to rely on coal from the Atlantic. Here alone is sufficient justification for the building of these railroads. We never have sufficient coal on hand for war purposes on the Pacific coast, and we never will have unless a complete change of policy is adopted, which is not probable. Even if the Navy so desired, the coal deteriorates so rapidly as to make keeping a war supply on hand impracticable.

Of all the stupid and inexcusable policies ever pursued by this Nation, the stupidest and most inexcusable has been the policy of the Government in using Atlantic coast coal for naval purposes on the Pacific. Admit all the naval experts claim as to the quality of the Pacific coast coal; that does not change the situation. No matter how bad it may be or how good the Pocahontas coal may be, it is the Pacific coast coal that we will have to use in time of war. It is useless to talk about the qualities of the coal either upon the Atlantic or the Pacific; that is entirely outside of the question, for in case of hostilities there will be no choice. In such an event the Navy must either use Pacific coast coal or go in under the protection of our fortifications. Is it not criminal folly to refuse to learn in time of peace how to make best use of the coal that we must use in time of war?

The coal on the Pacific coast requires a different method in handling from that on the Atlantic in order to develop its highest efficiency. Different grates, different apparatus, and different methods of firing are required. Yet it is impossible to get the Navy to use this coal even in time of peace. Merchant vessels handle this coal; they know how to get the greatest efficiency out of it. The great trans-Pacific liners all use it emelency out of it. The great trans-racine liners all use it successfully, but the Navy persistently and absolutely refuses to use it at any time or under any circumstances. For years I have urged that this coal be used in time of peace, so as to know, if the emergency arises, how to best use it in time of

I also urged that while Pacific coast coal be used in time of peace, that a supply for war purposes of the best that could be obtained anywhere be kept always on hand against the day of national necessity, but the only answer that I have ever re-ceived to my request that Pacific coast coal be used was the reply that "it made too much smoke; that it heats up the flues and melts the paint from the smokestacks." But what enemy in the "piping days of peace" is going to see the smoke from a best interests of the herds would be served by the killing of naval vessel as she makes her regular runs up and down Puget Sound, or as she coasts along the Pacific shores between Seattle and San Francisco? But would it smoke any less, or would the eyes of the enemy be to any extent dimmed, or the flues be kept any cooler, or the smokestacks retain their paint any better, if in time of peace we spend millions annually using a coal that we can not use in time of war?

It has been charged here upon the floor of this House that the Pocahontas coal combine has an undue influence over those in authority in the Navy Department. This charge has not been made by me. At least once it has come from the Democratic side of the House. I do not make that claim, although I do assert that this combination is always active against the proposed use of Pacific coast coal. Of course, in doing this they are simply looking after their own interests. I do think that the officials of the Navy are blinded to the real facts by their rigid adherence to their unchangeable rule that they must have the best, and that the cost is not to be considered. The best coal that can be obtained on the Pacific, however poor it may be, is the best naval coal that we can possibly procure, for that is what we will have to use if the time ever comes when we have any real use for the Navy. In time of peace the interest of the Nation demands that we should learn how most effectively to

This proposition of using Pacific coast coal because we must is entirely aside from the saving to the Nation of millions of dollars in time of peace by the use of the cheaper coal. believe that high-class coal will be found in Alaska, coal that equals, for naval purposes, that of any other coal in the world. Frankly, I doubt if any naval test will so show it. that there has never been any real, sincere attempt by the Navy Department to demonstrate the efficiency of Pacific coast coal I do know that there have been exhaustive, thorough, and gennine attempts to demonstrate its inefficiency. The Navy has never attempted to properly equip its vessels to make the test. It has always used vessels and men adapted for Pocahontas coal. One time when the test was being made I insisted that a different grate bar be used, as coal experts had told me that unless this was done that there would be no real test as to the efficiency of the coal used. The officer at San Francisco wired the department that he would not recommend that a different grate bar be tried, because it would cost $2,500 to make the change. He found $2,500 a sufficient reason to refuse to try to get the real facts in a test that involved a possible saving to the Government of $1,250,000 a year.

I remember that not a great while ago I was notified that notices had been published asking bids on a certain amount of coal to be used at the Puget Sound Navy Yard. This coal was not for use of naval vessels, but, as I recall, for power purposes

The notice stated that coal from only one mine would be considered. I found that this mine was entirely owned by a certain corporation. I concluded that under the circumstances it was highly probable that this particular owner would furnish the coal. This was the idea of the officer of competition in furnishing coal. Investigation proved that this one company was a foreign company. I protested to the Secretary of the Navy. He ordered an investigation and afterwards a readvertisement for bids, and the coal eventually was furnished by an American company. After the transaction was closed I asked the Assistant Secretary what reason the lieutenant who had the matter in charge gave for restricting his bids to this one British Columbia coal. His reply was that the lieutenant said that "the Washington coal dirtied his shirt." There is too much tendency in matters of this kind to look to the convenience of the officials and to appearances rather than to the real interests of the Government. There is just a little too much inclination to keep the shirt clean at Government expense. [Applause.]

To sum up, we must use for naval purposes Pacific coast coal, and it is of the highest national importance that we get the best that we can. The best to be obtained is in Alaska.

For the common defense we must have a naval station in Alaska. The nearest way to the Orient from the Pacific coast is along the Alaska shore. This is the most direct route, and in the future it will be the most important route. It is largely used now. The nearest way to the Orient from the Panama Canal is by way of Alaska. Do you realize that Seattle is exactly half way between Panama and Yokohama and almost exactly on the line of shortest distance? In case of war after the Panama Canal is completed, if our fleet was in the Caribbean Sea a fleet from Yokohama could beat it into Puget Sound. After the canal is completed any enemy from the Orient wishing to strike the Pacific coast would not come by Hawaii. In the first place, they would find Hawaii fortified, and in the next place it would be 1,500 miles out of the way. They would come in a short line along the Alaska coast, where they could, if they wished, find always convenient a safe and unfortified harbor where they could recoal or rest without danger.

Alaska is the place where, above all others to-day, we need a new naval station. The great difficulty is in getting from the map the real situation of the countries on the Pacific and the real distance between them. A battleship fleet in Alaska is in a far better position to strike an enemy in the Orient than one at Hawaii. It is in a far better position to protect the coast of the United States. It is in a better position to intercept a fleet from the Orient.

For naval purposes alone the construction of a railroad in Alaska is fully justified.

Coal is the key to Alaska. All other industries wait on this. Gold mining, copper mining, agriculture, and all other industrial developments will follow the coal development. The Geodetic Survey estimates that there are over 8,000,000 acres of coal land already known in Alaska, more than is contained in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio combined. This coal is of all grades. Coal is found everywhere throughout the entire Territory of Alaska, from the southern part on the Pacific to Point Barrow, on the Arctic Ocean.

For the purpose of this discussion it is only necessary to discuss the three most important fields, all of which will be made accessible by the building of the proposed roads. First, nearest tidewater and most accessible, is the Bering River field, and it is also the smallest of the three. It contains about 50,000 acres. The coal is of high grade-high-class bituminous, fit for steam and coking purposes. This field also contains some anthracite. This region can be reached by rail from Cordova by two routes, the distance by one way being 76 miles and by the other 90 miles. Thirty-eight miles of road that can be used by either route is already constructed. The remaining distance by either way can be constructed in a single season.

The Matanuska field contains coal of the same quality and kind as the Bering River. It is reported, however, to be more valuable in this, that it is less broken. This field from Seward by the proposed railroad route is 155 miles. Seventy-two miles of this proposed road are already constructed. It is reported that this field can be reached from a fine harbor on Prince William Sound by 100 miles of railroad, and at the same time by going this way the 1,700-foot grade now crossed by the present railroad would be avoided. The Matanuska field contains about 65,000 acres.

The two fields mentioned contain enough coal to supply not only all Alaska but all the Pacific coast with coal for centuries

The third field, known as the Bonnifield region, lies along the proposed route of the road that would connect Seward along the Copper River Valley with Fairbanks. This field is only about 70 miles from the city of Fairbanks. It is the largest of all the known coal fields of Alaska and contains more than all other known fields combined. Its extent is about 100,000 acres. The Geodetic Survey has estimated that the 122 square miles which they have surveyed contains 10,000,000,000 tons; and they add that this probably is not one-third of the actual amount. Natural cross sections in this field have shown seven or eight veins, with an aggregate thickness of 231 feet. This coal is lignite. It is suitable for power and domestic purposes and, owing to its accessibility and the ease with which it can be mined, it is destined to play a great part in the development of the interior regions of Alaska.

It must not be forgotten in considering this proposition of railway building that there is a wide market for Alaskan coal outside of Alaska. Alaska coal is suitable for naval purposes, and the Government, if these fields are developed, will save more than a million dollars annually in time of peace, even if they continue the policy that they have pursued in the past of keeping practically all of the Navy on this side of the continent. In time of war the development of the Alaska coal mines would certainly mean millions to the Nation, and they might be of value beyond all money computation.

There is a great market for coal in the States west of the Mississippi beyond what they produce. Last year the States west of the Mississippi produced 58,400,000 tons of coal. They consumed 125,000,000 tons; or, there was a shortage of 66,600,000 tons. True, most of this coal comes from eastern fields, and would probably continue to do so even if the coal in Alaska is developed. But the competition with Alaska coal would tend to reduce the price in most of this territory, and it would be a direct and strong competitor in the Pacific Coast States. Last year the Pacific Coast States bought 864,000 tons of foreign coal. If the coal mines in Alaska were developed, undoubtedly they would furnish the most of this coal and would force a great reduction in price. I understand that this foreign coal, bituminous in quality, the same as may be produced from Alaska mines, sells in Alaska from $14 to $25 per ton, in San Francisco from $10 to $12 per ton, and in Seattle from $0.50 to $10 per ton. If Alaskan mines are opened, it can certainly be bought in Alaska for from $4 to $5 per ton and in the cities of Seattle and San Francisco from $6 to $7 per ton. If we look only at the public good, the coal alone that will come from the development of the Alaskan coal mines would justify the Government in building the proposed road.

Last year, with coal everywhere, with men ready and willing to develop her mines, Alaska produced less than 2 per cent of the coal she consumed. With coal at their very threshold, the people of Alaska have been denied the right of use of it, even for domestic purposes, and have been compelled to purchase their ceal from various parts of the world at exorbitant prices. Last year the people of Alaska consumed 125,000 tons of coal and produced 355 tons. Gov. Strong, of Alaska, in his report, just submitted, calls attention to the fact that people within 50 miles of the greatest coal field in the world are paying $15 per cord for a very inferior quality of wood,

Why has not private enterprise opened these mines? If there is a market for Alaska coal and it can be profitably mined, why has it not been done? Why have not railroads been built to develop these great coal resources? This is a most pertinent question. This is really the heart of controversy involved in this question of the construction of railways. Gov. Strong, in his report recently submitted, answers this question in the following words:

The obstacles that have been placed in the way of developing the Territory by the means of railroads resulted from a mistaken conception of conservation principles and the popular fear that somehody would profit by commercial development of Alaska. Private initiative is practically barred from the Territory under present conditions.

That statement fully and fairly states the situation. Strong is a Democrat; he is a man of courage and ability; he speaks from conviction formed from long residence and experience in Alaska.

The curse of "conservation" fell on Alaska, and she was doomed. In this bill we are called upon to contribute some $35,000,000, the result of this hysterical craze, but it is a small contribution compared to what we have lost by it in Alaska, to say nothing of the great western part of the United States. There can be no railroad building in Alaska without opening the coal mines. Without this Alaskan development is completely strangled.

In 1906 an Executive order was issued suspending the coalland laws of Alaska. There was no more power or authority to suspend this law by Executive order than there is power and authority to-day to suspend by Executive order the Sherman antitrust law, or any other law that Congress has written upon the statute books. President Taft, recognizing the fact that there was no power in the Executive to make this order, asked Congress to give him the authority to ratify it. After long consideration of a bill for this purpose, Congress refused to give such authority. As I recall, the House did pass a bill containing a clause to that effect. However, after Congress refused to give him the power that he recognized that he did not possess, President Taft then solemnly proceeded to do it without au-In a royal edict he proceeded to ratify an order that was made without authority by issuing another absolutely without authority.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not want to get into any controversy. It takes too much time. Mr. MONDELL. But this is not a matter of controversy. The gentleman means that he had no authority to issue the order. He had the power, because he did issue it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true. He had the power. There is no question about that. He did not have the authority.

The history of this country furnishes no parallel to this Executive usurpation of power in the attempt to wipe from the statute books laws in relation to Alaska that Congress had But for fear that for some reason or other these Executive orders might be withdrawn or modified and that there would then exist a possibility that some of the coal of Alaska might be used, the Ferest Service, under the sham and pretense of wanting to protect the timber of Alaska, created a forest reserve, including all of the known high-grade coal fields of Alaska. This great forest reserve contains practically no timber. It was not intended to in any way protect or conserve the timber of Alaska, but it was issued for the sole purpose of making impossible the development of the coal mines of that country. The Forest Service wanted to be absolutely sure that if for any reason the President of the United States should reverse his policy upon the coal-land question that they would still be in a position to prevent all development.

For seven years it has been absolutely impossible under any condition or under any circumstance to own, control, or operate any coal mine in Alaska. Probably there has been nothing in the recent years in this country about which there has been so much hysterical declamation or so many lurid articles published in saffron-colored magazines as there have been about the imaginary conspiracy to steal the coal fields of Alaska.

If it be to my credit, I am not one of the recent converts to the Government keeping some control over the great coal mines of the country sufficient to prevent oppressive monopoly, to prevent such conditions as have existed in Pennsylvania for years. I so expressed myself more than 10 years ago, at the time of the great coal famine here in Washington City and other parts of the East. I have not changed my mind. But most of the stories told about the conspiracy to seize the coal lands of Alaska are not exactly a tale told by an idlot, but by the credulous and ignorant, "full of sound and fury, signifying

The total number of all the coal claims that have been filed in all parts of Alaska is 1,129. The majority of these have been voluntarily abandoned. Out of all this number, two—and two only—have been approved. One of these contains 65 acres, the other 130 acres; or, out of more than 8,000,000 acres of known coal land in Alaska, 185 acres have been patented, and these two patents have only been granted within the last few months, and both these claims contain low-grade, inferior coal.

Contests were ordered against every coal claim, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that has ever been filed in Alaska.

Gov. Strong in his recent report makes this statement:

In Alaska patents have been granted to only two coal-land claimants. In Alaska patents have been granted to only two coal-land claimants. These patents were issued for claims carrying an inferior quality of coal. Patents for coal lands have been applied for in the Bering River and Matanuska sections, but none have been granted, while many applications have been canceled. Some of these applications were no doubt fraudulent, but it seems inconceivable that all were tainted with fraud, when it is a well-known fact that a number of those who applied for patents were reputable and honorable men.

I most emphatically indorse that statement of Gov. Strong. But the question as to whether the application was fraudulent or made in good faith, whether the claimant was honest or dishonest, whether he had or had not complied with the law had nothing whatever to do with the allowing or the rejecting of his claim. In this respect the scoundrel and the law-abiding were treated just alike. For the past seven years the Government has held the money of the honest and the dishonest and has refused to grant to either a patent or to return the money to them. To have fully complied with the law availed the applicant nothing; it only caused the Secretary of the Interior to exercise his ingenuity to think of some other reason for refusing his claim.

I was with a claimant myself who presented his case to Secretary Fisher personally. After the hearing I asked the Secretary if he were satisfied that the claimant had in all respects complied with the law. He answered, "Yes," said, "You will grant the claim." He replied, "No He replied, "No: not; I will wait and see if Congress will not change the law." That was his idea of keeping his oath of office to obey and enforce the laws of his country. There have been many violations of law in relation to the coal lands of Alaska, most flagrant and outrageous. But these acts were not all committed by the claimants, but some of them by public officials whose sworn duty it was to impartially enforce and administer the laws.

Poor, weak, unfortunate, defenseless Alaska, for seven long years any public official from the President down to the fuzzyfaced forester set aside her laws at will.

Soon after the issuance of these Executive orders referred to another great statesman occupied the office of the Secretary of the Interior. He promulgated his justly famous doctrine, in one of his reports, that an executive officer had the authority to do anything not expressly prohibited by statute, a proposition so idiotic that it is beneath the contempt of any lawyer and so monstrous in its tyranny and injustice as to shock all rightthinking men when they stop and study what it means.

The spirit shown by these Secretaries seemed to permeate the entire Department of the Interior and the Forest Service down to the lowest underling that held a Government job. This force of petty officials in these departments ceased to try to carry out the purpose of their offices and became an army of hostile spies—cheap sensational detectives with all the discreditable and reprehensible methods of that despised class. Under this régime conditions became intolerable. Any man in Alaska that picked up a piece of coal from the millions of tons lying on the surface of the earth was liable to arrest and prosecution by these self-appointed guardians. Two prospectors away on its north shores, on the Bering Sea, on that great plain, hundreds of miles from human habitation, just under the Arctic Circle, in the most bleak and barren part of Alaska, where there are no trees but scrubby willows, one day picked up a few lumps of coal and made a camp fire to cook their food and to keep them warm. They were threatened with arrest and prosecution by one of these zealous guardians of the public interest who happened to learn of their action.

A man by the name of Whorf, who had lived with his family on a claim for many years, where three of his children had been born, sold to a Government revenue cutter out of fuel $500 worth of coal from a little mine that he had been working for many years. He sold it for half what the Government had been paying for coal. One of these Government-paid spies learned of this transaction. Whorf was arrested and fined by the Government he had accommodated $500. Whorf's claim is one of the two in all Alaska that has been accepted. This acceptance occurred recently.

For a Government official to help an honest applicant to secure his claim became a serious offense. To charge him with fraud, to trap him into damaging admissions, to annoy and harass him, and to defeat his claim brought attention, publicity, approval, and hope of preferment. Under this influence this army of petty Government emissaries, failing to find in the language of the law the specific words "thou shalt not bear false witness," proceeded, under the hypocritical pretense of protecting the public, with the cry "conservation" on their lips, to make charges of fraud and crime against every coal claimant in Alaska—every one, the honest and dishonest alike, regardless of the character of the claimant or the facts in the case. The result was industrial paralysis of the entire Territory. This is what is the matter with Alaska. The responsibility rests with the Government, and the Government alone can now bring relief.

In spite of all the clamor and noise that has been made about the attempt to steal coal lands in Alaska, no one has yet been convicted in any court of wrongdoing in connection therewith, notwithstanding that in one case at least the judge on the bench was an ardent assistant prosecutor. Many of these coal claimants who have been arrested and prosecuted have been charged with the crime of doing what the law now expressly permits them to do.

This thought has sometimes occurred to me: Suppose a thief should procure a coal mine in Alaska, he could not run away with it or take it out of the country. The very worst thing that he could possibly do with it would be to let it alone, pre-The very worst thing vent its development, just as is done to-day. If a man wanted a claim badly enough to steal it, possibly he would want it badly enough to work it. If he worked it he would at least furnish somebody with coal. Would that be more of a crime than to keep it forever from the use of men. It has sometimes occurred to me that even coal from a mine owned by a thief will burn. That even coal from a mine owned by a thief would warm the honest. That coal from a mine even owned by a thief would furnish heat to keep a family from freezing. It has sometimes occurred to me that coal from a mine owned even by a thief might furnish the necessary fuel to keep warm some lonely prospector who was working and struggling to wrest from the earth a little of its riches to care for the loved ones at home. It has sometimes occurred to me that coal from a mine even owned by a thief, sold to the patient and long-suffering people of Alaska for from $3 to $5 per ton, would be as great a blessing to them and to the world as to compel them to pay from $15 to $25 per ton for the same character of coal brought from some foreign country, in a foreign ship, or even to compel them to pay that price to the Pocahontas Trust here on the Atlantic. It has sometimes occurred to me that it would be better to have coal produced even by a thief than not to have coal at all.

If I could utter words that would writhe and hiss like slimy serpents, I could not express my resentment of the infamous insinuation continually made that every man that Las sought to secure a coal claim in Alaska is a thief and a crook. There are no more courageous, stronger, better men, and there never will be, than the men that have gone into that great Territory and tolled and struggled and given their all to develop it. There are no truer, manlier men, and there never will be, than the Alaska pioneers.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

I am opposed to Government ownership, and always have been, as a general proposition. I know that the Government way has always been the most costly way. Government control and operation of business generally will destroy the initiative of the individual, dwarf the common intellect, and weaken the race. I believe that Government ownership as a policy faces toward darkness; that eventually it would destroy government, lead back to the rule of the stronger few in each community, and finally end in tribal savagery. But I am not opposed to the Government constructing these railroads in Alaska, for this reason—because private ownership can not do it. The Government must build these railroads or they will not be built. It is Government ownership or nothing. It is the only way, and we must face this fact.

only way, and we must face this fact.

Under these circumstances, I do not know that it will be profitable to enter into any extended discussion of the question of Government ownership. However, ownership by the Government of a railroad I do not regard as having but few of the objections that can be urged against Government operation of railroads. In the operation lies the greatest objection, and I trust that Congress will never permit the Government to operate these railroads unless all other methods are demonstrated to be failures. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my entire life up to the time I was first elected to Congress was spent in the trans-Mississippi West, most of it in new and developing portions of that great country, a considerable part of it on the extreme frontier and in the active prosecution, under the roughest and hardest of frontier conditions, of development enterprises. This experience gave me a knowledge and understanding of the difficulties which the pioneer in a new and frontier country encounters. The recollection of that experience naturally quickens my sympathies for those engaged in the heroic work of blazing trails, prospecting for and developing resources, and laying the foundations of civilization and industrial enterprise amid the trying conditions which surround new and frontier development.

This experience, these sympathies, naturally incline me to favor any legislation the avowed object of which is to aid, encourage, or assist in the settlement and development of the newer portions of our country. My sympathies are particularly aroused when such aid, encouragement, or assistance is proposed on behalf of those whose courage and enterprise have led them to cast their lot with and attempt the development and settlement of our farthest and most inaccessible territory. The courage and hardihood, the unflagging faith and optimism of those who are contending with adverse conditions in Alaska, appeals to us all. They appeal with peculiar force to those who by reason of their own experience are fully able to realize and intelligently judge of the difficulties which distance, lack of facilities, mountain barriers, and a rigorous climate present to every attempt at settlement and development.

In addition to these considerations which incline me to the support of legislation the avowed purpose of which is to make easier the pathway of the pioneer in Alaska is the fact that the measure has much support among those with whom I like to agree and is being urged by many from the general region from which I hail. This legislation presents to me one of those problems frequently met in the discharge of the duty of a legislator; one's sympathies are aroused; one's inclinations are favorable to the realization of the object sought; public opinion, so far as there is any on the subject, locally and possibly generally, is either actively favorable or passively acquiescent. The easy way, the pleasant way, and the temporarily satisfactory way is to follow one's sympathies, one's inclinations, and to drift along with what seems to be the present public sentiment. But unless the action proposed commends itself to the judgment and to the conscience of the legislator it is not the honest way nor the wise way.

I have not come to the conclusion that it is my duty to oppose this legislation without full and earnest consideration of what it proposes and what its immediate and ultimate effect is likely to be both on Alaska and the balance of the country. I have not arrived at this conclusion without having fortified what knowledge and information I had in regard to Alaska, her resources and her conditions, by reading carefully the report of the Alaskan Railway Commission and the record of the hearings before the House and Senate Committees on Territories on bills proposing Government aid to railroads in Alaska.

There are three classes of men on the floor of the House who may be somewhat justified in support of this legislation: First. Those, like the gentleman who has just spoken, who come from that Puget Sound country, that will be greatly benefited by the expenditure of $35,000,000 under this bill and by the additional millions which must inevitably follow. Whether Members fully believe in the wisdom of a proposition or not, the fact that great sums are to be spent for the development of industries that are appurtenant and of regions that are adjacent to our districts has a persuading influence upon us all.

Second. Gentlemen can perhaps afford to support this legislation with a clear political conscience who are so utterly opposed to Government ownership and operation of railroads, now or in the future, that they support this legislation in the hope that its passage and execution will forever scotch the idea of Government ownership, by reason of the failure that is likely to result from the expenditure of this money.

Third. Gentlemen may feel justified in supporting this legislation because they favor the system of private ownership of coal lands in Alaska, and believe this legislation will forever fix and perpetuate that system.

REASONS FOR OPPOSING THE LEGISLATION.

I find it my duty to oppose this legislation, first, because I do not believe that Government ownership and operation of railways would be economically beneficial to the people, and because I do believe it would be exceedingly unfortunate in its effect politically.

Second, I oppose the legislation because, if I did believe in Government ownership and operation of railways, I should certainly not want to try it out under the necessarily unfavorable conditions of a region of high cost of construction, of uncertain tonnage, and of difficulties of operation more trying than any which railways in the States have ever met:

Third, I am opposed to the legislation because I am fully convinced that it is entirely unnecessary to expend Government money in order to secure the building of railroads in Alaska connecting the coal fields with tidewater. I am also quite well satisfied that it is equally unnecessary to do anything more than extend reasonable and inexpensive aid and encouragement to secure the speedy building of at least one and probably two lines of railroad connecting central tidewater Alaska with her interior navigable rivers. I am fully satisfied that with proper and reasonable legislation and departmental action, which will make possible the mining of coal in Alaska, private enterprise will build the short connections necessary to bring the coal to tidewater more speedlly than it could possibly be accomplished under the provisions of this bill. Relief from taxation for a few years will probably be all that will be necessary to insure prompt construction of lines to the interior.

If I believed there was a condition, however created or maintained, which made it a matter of extraordinary difficulty or of practical impossibility to secure for Alaska the short lines necessary to bring her bituminous coal to tidewater and the building of at least one line to connect the central valleys with the coast, and that the conditions thus existing placed an obligation upon the Government to afford the aid necessary to overcome the difficulty, still I could not favor this legislation. I could not, because under the guise of building two comparatively short lengths of road, primarily for coal transportation, and two lines connecting the interior with the coast, it in fact proposes the inauguration of a system of complete Government ownership and control of transportation in Alaska, the ultimate cost and effect of which no man can possibly foresee or judge.

The measure on its face, interpreted in the light of the report of the Alaskan Railway Commission, on which it is based, and of the views expressed in the hearings by those who favored it, and in the majority report, which supports it, contemplates the construction of about 735 miles of standard-gauge railroad line, or the building of less mileage and the purchase, condemnation, or lease of privately owned roads. It also provides for the acquisition of terminals, port facilities, and all those things which are necessarily a part of, or appurtenant to, railway lines such as those contemplated. The proposed bond issue of $35,000,000 can not, in the nature of things, pay for all that is loosely proposed in the bill, and would be but a beginning, the end of which we can not possibly foresee, of additional construction, purchase, and expenditure.

THE ALASKA PROBLEM.

Alaska is a long way off; there is a certain glamor of romance about that far-away land, with its towering mountain ranges, its wonderful coast line, its vast resources, its rock and ice barriers, and its generally rigorous climate. A great deal has been written of its resources and of its conditions, much of which is highly colored and considerably exaggerated. A fierce controversy—partly economic, largely personal and political—has raged around the question of the disposition of certain resources of the country. Out of all these things has come this proposition, which, applied to any other part of the country or suggested under any other conditions with regard to any portion of our territory, would not be favorably considered for a moment.

There must be very extraordinary and unusual conditions if we are warranted in embarking on a policy that few of us approve or would tolerate anywhere else; upon an expenditure of the people's money which, large as it is, is but the beginning of vastly greater expenditures; on behalf of a Territory of sparse population, at a time when given opportunity private enterprise will carry on the work contemplated, or such part of it as is justified by conditions. This vast and questionable expenditure is proposed at a time when the people within our continental boundary are insisting upon larger expenditures by the Federal Government for purposes which they believe would beneficially affect great numbers of our ninety-odd millions of people. Before we embark upon this enterprise, questionable as to its necessity and as to its effect, we should at least give some consideration to demands on behalf of all our people for expenditures along lines the benefits of which can not be doubted.

THE ALASKAN SITUATION.

In order to form an intelligent idea of the conditions upon which this unusual proposition of legislation is predicated it is necessary to briefly review the situation in Alaska for the last few years. The development of Alaska began with the Alaskan purchase and continued slowly but steadily, mostly along its southeast coast and particularly in connection with the fisheries. One very large and profitable gold mine had been developed on Treadwell Island, and a number of small properties were in the prospecting or developing stage. Copper had been discovered at various points along the coast and, to a limited extent, in the interior. Vast deposits of lignite coal had been found at various points along the coast and utilized in a small way for local use. Provision had been made by Congress for securing lands for purposes of trade and transportation. Then came the discovery of gold in the Klondike in 1896, the great rush to that region, the building of the White Pass Railway from Skagway, the extension of gold discoveries into American territory in the Yukon Valley, the establishment of transportation on that river, and a remarkable era of prospecting throughout all the American territory as far north as the Arctic Circle and beyond.

Following this activity came the demand for needed legislation, to which Congress gradually responded. By the act of June 6, 1900, the coal-land laws of the United States—providing for entries by individuals in tracts of not to exceed 160 acres at the price of $10 or $20 an acre, depending upon the distance from railroad—were extended to Alaska. As there were no railroads near the coal fields the act in effect fixed a $10 selling price on all Alaskan coal lands.

The act thus extended contemplated entries on surveyed lands, but there were no official surveys in Alaska and none were executed. Congress met this situation by the act of April 28, 1904, providing for special surveys to be executed at the expense of the entryman. Under this act many claims were filed in the Bering and Matanuska coal fields, which contain highgrade bituminous and some anthracite coal.

The discovery of rich gold placers in the interior, valuable deposits of copper, and coal suitable for industrial purposes not only led to a great influx of prospectors and investors, but it brought a boom in the location of town sites on available harbors and in the promotion and construction of railroads. The summer of 1906 saw great activity along these lines. Railroads were projected or under construction from Cordova, Katalla, and Valdez looking to the development of the Bering River coal field, the rich mineral territory along Copper River, and extension to the valleys of the Tanana and Yukon. A line was building from Seward, on Resurrection Bay, headed for the Matanuska coal fields and the valleys of the Susitna, the Tanana, and the Yukon. Various other lines were suggested, promoted, or under construction; in fact, there seemed to be an abundance of capital ready and willing to embark in railway construction in the Territory. Competition was, in fact, so intense as to lead to more or less serious contests in a few instances between rival claimants for the right to build over the same route. Alaska was booming and investment in Alaska mines and railways was quite the fad and the fashion.

THE WITHDRAWAL ORDER.

Upon this condition of affairs came the Executive orders of November 12, 1906, as modified by the order of December 17, 1906, withdrawing all coal lands in Alaska from entry. These orders did not have the effect of immediately suspending railroad building, by reason of the fact that a considerable number of coal entries had been made, and it was generally supposed that patents would issue in due course for such as were found regular and valid. On a number of claims work of development progressed, and in the case of at least one, the McDonald claim in the Bering River coal field, some coal was taken out. Such operations were, however, soon suspended by the action of the local land agents, presumably acting upon orders from Washington. Even then, however, it was not generally assumed that this suspension in development was to be permanent, and a considerable number of entrymen proceeded to the work of perfecting their claims.

On the assembling of Congress in December, 1907, a year after the withdrawal orders, the attention of the committees of Congress having to do with land matters was called by a considerable number of Alaskan entrymen to the difficulties they were having in making and securing approval of the surveys of their coal claims. It was insisted and proved to the satisfaction of the committees that many of the entrymen being men of limited means were unable out of their own resources to make the necessary surveys and prosecute their entries to patent. Attention was further called to the fact that it was not practical under the conditions which existed in Alaska, owing to the topography of the claims and the necessity of large expenditures in opening and developing a mine, to open and operate a mine upon each 160 acres. In order to relieve this situation and make development possible, and at the same time fully protect the public from monopoly in ownership or excessive charges, the act of May 28, 1908, was passed.

This act legalized a consolidation of 2,560 acres of coal lands, or sixteen 160-acre claims. This act is still in force, and provides among other things that the United States shall have a preference right at all times to purchase so much of the product of the mines opened upon the consolidated claims as may be required for the Army and Navy, at a price to be fixed by the President, and also contained, as section 3, the most drastic antimonopoly clause ever written into a land statute. It is as follows:

Sec. 3. That if any of the lands or deposits purchased under the provisions of this act shall be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination, or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, mortgage, stock ownership, or control in excess of 2,560 acres in the District of Alaska, the title thereto shall be forfeited to the United States by proceedings instituted by the Attorney General of the United States in the courts for that purpose.

Prior to the passage of this act, but some months after the withdrawal order, the 33 so-called Cunningham claims had been entered and paid for, receiver's certificates issued, and soon after the passage of the act the agitation over these claims, which has become historical, began. Some claimants have attempted to secure title under the act of 1908, but so far have failed. In fact, after agitation in regard to the Cunningham claims became acute all action looking to approval or patenting of coal entries in Alaska was suspended. This is the situation at the present time, though my understanding is that the Interior Department is now investigating certain claims with a view of passing upon their validity, and patents for a few acres of lignite coal lands have been issued.

A NEW LEGISLATIVE POLICY DEMANDED.

The tying up of the coal lands, which occurred by reason of the withdrawal orders of 1906, and the attitude of the Interior Department in refusing to issue patents on entries made prior to withdrawal led to an almost total suspension of railroad building along the central Alaskan coast line. The line projected from Seward to the Matanuska coal fields brought its construction to a halt 72 miles from Seward and 115 miles from Matanuska coal fields. The contemplated 38-mile Bering River coal branch from the Copper River & Northwestern after some grading had been done was abandoned. The only standard-gauge line in the entire Territory which was continuously constructed after 1906 was the main line of the Copper River & Northwestern to Chitina and the Kennicott copper mines, 196 The condition thus created was, of course, intolerable and not to be contemplated as a permanent condition. coal fields, the Bering and Matanuska, are the only fields so far discovered in American territory near the Pacific which contain coal in considerable quantities fit for the making of firstclass coke for smelting and suitable for naval and general steaming purposes. It was highly important that something be done whereby these coal fields could be developed and their product utilized. The Interior Department was pressed to issue patents, for some of the claims at least, and the Public Land Committees of the House and Senate were urged to pre-sent legislation dealing with the situation. The President, the Secretary of the Interior, and heads of Government bureaus urged legislation that would provide for the leasing of the coal lands remaining in public ownership. There seemed to be a general public sentiment against continuing the policy of alienating the title to coal lands and in favor of the establishment of a policy of granting the right to mine coal on the public lands under lease.

I chanced to be chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House at the time when these demands for new legisla-tion radically different from our former legislation affecting coal lands became particularly insistent. This was at the beginning of the session of the Sixty-first Congress, which began in 1910, four years after the order of withdrawal. At that time it seemed probable that the Interior Department would ultimately hold that a large number, if not most, of the coal claims in Alaska were invalid. Personally I had not been particularly enamored of a Federal coal-leasing system. I was favorable to the retention of coal lands in public ownership if they could be leased under local or State control, but I had some doubt of a Federal leasing system. I felt it my duty, however, to defer to what seemed to be the general public opinion of the country and of Members of Congress with whom I talked, and set about the drafting of legislation for the leasing of the public coal lands of Alaska under limitations, terms, and conditions that would fully safeguard the public interest.

THE LEASING BILL INTRODUCED AND REPORTED.

Such a bill was drawn and introduced by me in January, 1911, during the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, as House bill 32080. After long and careful consideration and some amendment the bill was unanimously indorsed by the Committee on the Public Lands and reported on February 17, 1911. When I reported the bill I confidently expected that opportunity would be given, by special rule or otherwise, for full consideration of the measure, with opportunity for amendment, but the session was drawing to a close, many appropriation bills remained unacted upon, other legislation deemed of great importance was demanding right of way, and no opportunity for such consideration seemed possible. In this condition of affairs I felt it my duty to present the bill in any way possible in order that the Senate might, if it desired, pass it before the cession ended. I was therefore compelled to bring it up under suspension of the rules, which I did on February 23, 1911.

There was then before the House, unacted upon, the report of the joint committee in the so-called Pinchot-Ballinger contro-Versy. Feeling ran high in regard to all matters relating to coal in Alaska. Furthermore, the Pinchot-Ballinger episode was good political capital; the passage of a workable and satisfactory coal-leasing bill would have tended to eliminate it from public controversy and political campaigns. I desire to now emphasize the fact that the measure then presented was a good, workable coal-leasing bill, which thoroughly safeguarded every public interest, and that those who were interested in such legispublic interest, and that those who were interested in such legislation had abundant opportunity to inform themselves as to those facts. There are, no doubt, some who took no special interest in the subject who were doubtless misinformed as to the provisions of the bill, but no one who cared to be had any excuse for not being informed. In order that those who are sufficiently interested to investigate may know how fair and workable a measure it was, how thoroughly it protected the public interest, I shall insert in the Record, as a part of my remarks, a copy of the bill as agreed upon and as presented to the House for passage. It is as follows:

remarks, a copy of the bill as agreed upon and as presented to the House for passage. It is as follows:

A bill to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Be it enocted, etc., That all lands in the Territory of Alaska containing workable deposits of coal are hereby reserved from all forms of entry, appropriation, and disposal, except under the provisions of this act: Provided. That nothing herein contained shall in any manner affect any claims or rights to any such lands heretofore asserted or established under the land laws of the United States, and all such claims and rights shall be treated, passed upon, and disposed of as though this act had not been passed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, for and on behalf of the United States, to issue licenses granting the holders thereof the right to prospect and explore for coal on the vacant public lands in the Territory of Alaska and to execute leases authorizing the lessee to mine and remove coal from such lands. No license shall pertain to an area of more than 3,200 acres, and no lease shall pertain to an area of more than 3,200 acres, and no lease shall pertain to an area of more than 2,560 acres, and all such areas shall be in reasonably compact form and conform to the public land surveys in all cases in which said surveys have been extended over the lands. No prospecting permit shall be issued for a longer period than three years. All licenses shall pay in advance a fee of 25 cents per acre for the first year covered by their license, 50 cents per acre for the second year, and to less than $1 and not more than $4 per acre for the first calendar year, or fraction thereof, 50 cents per acre for the third year. Lessees shall pay in advance a rental of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year, or fraction thereof, 50 cents per acre for the second year, and to less than $1 and not more than $4 per acre for the succeeding year. The sums paid for rent by a lessee shall granted for such period as the lessee shall designate, but in no event for more than 30 years; but all lessees who have complied with the terms of their leases shall have a preferential right to an extension of their lease for a period not to exceed 20 years upon such conditions and the payment of such rents and royalties as Congress may prescribe.

SEC. 3. That any person over the age of 21 years, who is a citizen of the United States, or any association or corporation composed of such persons, may apply for a permit to prospect for or a lease to mine coal in the Territory of Alaska, and upon compliance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder, shall be granted a license or lease, as provided herein; but no person, association, or corporation, or stockholder therein, shall during the lifetime of such permit or lease receive or be permitted to hold, directly or indirectly, any other permit, lease, or license, or any interest therein, to coal lands in Alaska under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That applications for prospecting licenses and mining leases, and all payments on same, shall be made to such officer and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, and in all cases where more than one application shall be received for a license or lease covering the same area, in whole or in part, preference shall be given to the qualified applicant who shall show legal prior possession in good faith with a view of acquiring title to coal lands or prospecting for or mining coal, and reasonable diligence in applying for such license or lease; but the holder of a prospecting license shall have a preference right, during the period of his license, to apply for and obtain a mining lease to the lands covered by his license, provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may adjust the boundaries of conflicting applications in such manner as will best promote the public interest.

SEC. 5. That all applications for licenses or leases shall describe the lands ap a preference right, during the period of his ilcones, to apply for and obtain a mining lease to the lands covered by his license: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may adjust the boundaries of conflicting applications in such manner as will best promote the public linterest.

SEC. 5. That all applications for licenses or leases shall describe the lands applied for according to the public land surveys or private surveys or surveys and reference to natural objects or permanent monuments as will readily identify the same. No license or lease shall be issued until a survey and private surveys of the lessee, by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior permanently marking the outboundaries thereof and sudvividing the same according to the rectangular system of surveys. Licenses may be canceled by the Secretary of the Interior after reasonable notice for fallure to pay rent when due.

SEC. 6. That all leases issued under the provisions of this act shall be successed and the surveys of the surveys of the surveys of the private surveys of the surveys limitations and uniquations content of the act.

SEC. 9. That a license or lease may be terminated at any time on the application of the licensee or lessee and the payment of all rents and royalties which may be due, but no lease shall be ferminated until the Secretary of the Interior shall have had an opportunity to have an examination made into the condition of the property and such reasonable provision shall have been made for the preservation of any mine or mines which may have been opened on same, as he may require. Upon the cancellation of the lease or its expiration, or upon the forfeiture thereof and the satisfaction of any judgment rendered in the decree of forfeiture and the payment of all rents and royalties due, the retiring lessee may, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, remove or dispose of all of the machinery, buildings, or structures upon the leased premises, except such structures as may be necessary for the preservation of the mines.

SEC. 10. That no prospecting license issued under the provisions of this act shall give the licensee the exclusive use of any of the lands covered by his license, except for the purpose of prospecting and exploring the same, but all lessees under the provisions of this act shall enjoy the exclusive use of the surface, providing that this exclusive use shall in no wise interfere with the establishment and use of all necessary roads and highways, so located as not to interfere with the mining operations, and the granting by the Secretary of the Interior of such rights of way across such lands as may be necessary for use in the production, handling, or transportation of coal or other products of the District of Alaska.

SEC. 11. That 75 per cent of all the moneys derived from licenses and leases granted under the provisions of this act shall be paid into and constitute a part of the "Alaska fund" in the Treasury of the United States, provided for and created by the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905, and may be expended for the purposes described in said act; and the residue of the moneys derived from such licenses and leases shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and constitute a part of the general fund of the Treasury.

Sec. 12. That the reservation contained in section 1 of this act shall not prevent the location and patenting of lands containing workable deposits of coal under the mining laws of the United States with a view of extracting metalliferous minerals therefrom; but licenses and leases provided for in this act may be issued without regard to

NO OTHER LEGISLATION OFFERED.

I was naturally somewhat chagrined that the earnest effort of myself and my colleagues to provide such legislation as we believed public sentiment demanded, such legislation as the gentlemen who call themselves conservationists were insist-ing should be had, should fail of enactment, but I never dreamed that those who had been clamoring for leasing legislation for coal lands in Alaska, but who did not see fit to support the bill that was offered, should themselves fail utterly to propose or urge any legislation to clear up the situation or open the coal resources of Alaska, and thus make possible the development of the central coast region and the interior valleys. Three years have elapsed since that time. I and my colleagues of the committee, after having attempted and failed, have naturally felt that it was not seemly for us to make a second attempt, but we have waited in vain for those who insist that coal lands in Alaska shall not be alienated to bring in some legislation under which the coal may be utilized and the title retained in the Government.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

During the course of his testimony before the Committee on Territories in May last, in connection with a bill similar to the one before us, Mr. Pinchot was asked by Senator Hitch-COCK this question:

Suppose it comes to the question whether development in Alaska shall be permitted to go on under the laws as they now exist, where private individuals may acquire the great resources the Government has, or whether the development shall be delayed until leasing laws can be provided under which resources may be retained in the hands of the Government, which would you prefer?

To which Mr. Pinchot replied:

I should say that the man who checked the development of Alaska under reasonable laws ought to take the responsibility, and that the resources ought not to be given away in perpetuity to private interests because certain other private interests were not willing to let legislation pass.

I commend these words of Mr. Pinchot to the gentlemen who, in February, 1911, refused to allow the passage of a perfectly sane and carefully safeguarded leasing law, and who have not since made the slightest apparent effort to secure the passage of leasing legislation that would be acceptable to them.

I am perfectly willing to agree that the condition of stagnation which now exists along the central coast line of Alaska, and the unfortunate handicap to the development of the interior basin which that stagnation produces, is not necessarily altogether the result of the Executive order withdrawing coal lands of Alaska from entry. That Executive order followed like orders affecting many of the Western States, with a view of classifying coal lands and unsing leasing legislation. It of classifying coal lands and urging leasing legislation. It was not issued, in my opinion, with the idea that it would of itself in anywise affect the patenting of lands upon which claims had been filed. Action looking to the perfection of entries, the receipt of money by the Government for coal claims, and the issuance of certificates continued after the order of withdrawal. The Alaskan order of withdrawal was issued as an afterthought following a suggestion of the Acting Director of the Geological Survey, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, dated December 3, 1906, to the effect that the reasons for withdrawing the coal of Alaska from entry were as urgent as in the Western States and Territories.

The present condition of suspended railway construction in Alaska, which is used as an excuse for this legislation, is due partly to the fact that during the excitement incident to the discussion of the so-called Cunningham claims no coal-land patents were issued in Alaska, and with a few unimportant exceptions none have been issued up to this time, notwithstanding the fact that there are some claims still under consideration which are claimed to be entirely regular and free from any charge of fraud. This situation is, however, mostly due to the fact that in February, 1911, a sound, sane, sensible, and carefully guarded leasing bill was defeated by a combination of those who do not believe in any leasing legislation and want to continue coal-land sale laws in force, and those who, claiming to favor leasing legislation, defeated a good leasing bill, and have offered nothing in lieu of it.

FIRST FRUITS OF ALASKAN CONSERVATION.

This legislation, which proposes to spend $35,000,000 of the public money for the inauguration of a policy of Government ownership of transportation in Alaska, the limit or ultimate cost of which no man can see, is the first fruits of a theory of conservation which finds its expression in a complete tying up of resources. This is the first dividend on Alaskan conservation, It is the kind known as an Irish dividend, and not at all the sort that the people have been promised by those who, having applauded the locking up of Alaska's coal resources, have presented no plan, proposition, or policy under which they can be unlocked. In the days of the Ballinger-Pinchot contest I have no doubt many people got the idea that the coal fields of Alaska would eventually bring large revenues to all of the people of the country. I can imagine the disgust of such folks when they come to understand that the first fruits of the policy is an immediate addition of $35,000,000 to the public debt, in the inauguration of a plan involving vastly greater expenditure in the future. We may obtain some faint notion of what is involved from the enthusiastic and optimistic declarations of certain Alaska people, in connection with the hearings, to the effect that 10,000 miles of road instead of 750 will be eventually required for the development of that great Territory, and that great naval bases, Government ports, wharves, and docks and possibly steamship lines would follow. Freight rates based on a lower percentage of return for the investment than are enjoyed by the people in any part of the Union is one of the anticipated blessings, with a recital of which various gentlemen embellished the record of the hearings.

ALLEGED TRANSPORTATION MONOPOLY.

An effort was made during the hearings to create the impression, as an excuse for this legislation, that Alaska is in the grip of a transportation monopoly and will have no more railroads unless the Government builds them. Some most remarkable statements were made to bolster up this theory, but unfortunately for the gentlemen the facts, even as they presented them, are against them. Much has been made of a statement by a Mr. Ballaine, a resident of the State of Washington and a town-site boomer of Seward, who had something to do with the building of the first 20 miles of railroad from Seward, headed for the Matanuska coal fields and the Tanana Valley, purporting to be conclusive proof of the existence of a conspiracy to prevent construction of railroads in Alaska. This engaging tale is to the effect that, after the Alaska Northern had gotten into financial difficulties, he (Ballaine) wrote J. P. Morgan to ascertain whether Mr. Morgan would back him in a project to secure the road and extend it north to the coal fields and the Tanana Valley as a narrow-gauge road. He claimed to have interviewed Mr. George W. Perkins on this behalf, and that Mr. Perkins looked upon the proposition with some favor, but said that he would have to confer with Mr. Morgan and with the Guggenheims, with whom Mr. Morgan was interested in the Copper River & Northwestern, which was also planning an extension into the Tanana Valley.

Mr. Ballaine's story, as continued, is that later Mr. Perkins informed him that the Guggenheim Bros. had refused to give their approval of Morgan & Co. taking over the financing of this project for a narrow-gauge railroad from Seward into the Tanana because they contemplated an extension of their own standard-gauge Copper River line. Mr. Ballaine went on to say that Mr. Perkins also informed him that Mr. Guggenheim had expressed the opinion that there would be no more railroad building in Alaska until the coal fields were open. Mr. Ballaine admits that it is his understanding that Mr. Per- cessful. What gentlemen from Alaska have in mind in urging kins denied ever having had any negotiations of any kind with him-denied even having met him-and Mr. Perkins, let it be remembered, is the angel ever bright and fair of an optimistic political organization and held up by them as a fine example of a truly good rich man. I am perfectly willing, however, if it will please anyone, to admit that perhaps Mr. Perkins is mistaken; that perhaps he did listen to the suggestions of an optimistic town-site boomer that he get Mr. Morgan and the Guggenheims to put many millions into his hands to build a railroad, and that Mr. Guggenheim said in this connection what Mr. Ballaine says Mr. Perkins said, for what does it all

The Guggenheim Bros., Mr. Morgan, and others, known as the Alaskan Syndicate, own the Copper River & Northwestern, on which they have spent, it is said, upward of nearly $20,000,000. The first 132 miles of their standard-gauge road from Cordova reaches Chitina, the point from which it is contemplated under this bill that the Government shall build an extension of the Guggenheim line, as the Guggenheims have themselves contemplated, 313 miles, to Fairbanks, on the Tanana. Along comes an impecunious stranger who, through various intermediaries, proposes to the Guggenheims that they turn over to him millions enough to build a narrow-gauge road from the end of the line out of Seward to the Matanuska coal fields and on to Fairbanks. Assuming, if one can stretch his credulity enough to imagine such a proposition, that Mr. Perkins or anyone else gave serious thought to this proposition, would anyone imagine that any business man, no matter who he was, would, in the first place, give millions to a man of limited financial resources and unknown to them, and particularly for the building of a narrow-gauge road where a standard gauge ought to be built, that narrow gauge to tap the very territory which the parties from whom the money was requested were proposing to reach by a road from another direction? The final clincher of this alleged argument is to the effect that Mr. Perkins, who claims he never saw Mr. Ballaine, said to Mr. Ballaine that the Guggenheims said that no more railroads would be built in Alaska until the coal fields were open. Would any sane man, having in mind roads that were to tap the coal fields, have said anything else? Is not the fact that this bill is here proof that private enterprise will not build to coal fields unless there is to be some assurance of tonnage after they get

In order to prove conclusively, as they apparently imagine, that there is or was a horrible conspiracy to keep anyone except the members of the Alaska Syndicate out of Alaska they rehash the story of a conflict which occurred years ago a short distance out of Valdez between some employees of the Alaska Syndicate and some people interested in the so-called Home Railroad. The curious thing about this is that in all the lively contests there were at that time in Alaska to secure the best railroad locations this is the only serious case of actual vio-lence. There is not a State in the mountain West, scarcely a State anywhere, that has not had its cases of conflict over rights of way. While in this case the Alaska Syndicate was rights of way. held by the court to be responsible for the acts of its employees, the fact remains that the Alaska Syndicate was actually first on the ground and had done a very considerable amount of work before the Home Railway was organized. This does not justify the acts of violence, but makes it very clear that this single, solitary isolated case was in nowise part of a conspiracy to monopolize railroads in Alaska. The efforts made during the hearings to excuse those responsible for the opposition to legislation that would open the coal fields and thus lead to railroad building and to give an appealing excuse for this legislation fell very flat, as anyone will discover who will take the trouble to read the record. It was clearly brought out that private capital has been ready and willing to build the lines to the coal fields; is now ready to do so; not only that but claims to be ready to build on to the Tanana and the Yukon, if a coal tonnage can be secured and fuel can be obtained for the running of engines.

FREIGHT RATES.

There is a great deal in the hearings with regard to freight rates in Alaska. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKER-SHAM | complained bitterly of the freight rates of the Copper River & Northwestern, a road whose rates are supervised by the Interstate Commerce Commission. When asked if any complaints had been made to the commission, his answer was in the negative. When asked if the road was paying expenses or making money under these rates, he stated he did not know. The gentleman also complained of the high river rates, and yet all admit that there is a bone yard on the banks of the lower Yukon containing about 50 boats that have been unsucthis legislation is not a freight rate based on a fair return for the capital invested but a freight rate based on a 3 per cent Government interest rate at the most, and a still lower rate if a rate based on 3 per cent interest should be a little higher than they like. In the part of the country in which I live we are very glad to get railroads, and would be delighted if their rates were based on nothing higher than a 6 or 7 per cent return. We are expected to do much better than that for the people of Alaska under this bill.

AGRICULTURAL POSSIBILITIES.

The passage of this legislation is further urged on the ground that there are great agricultural possibilities in Alaska, and that we should spend great sums of the people's money in order to afford opportunity for agricultural settlement. I am an agricultural optimist. I have great faith in the possibilities of ultimate agricultural development in many portions, not only of Alaska but on millions of acres now untilled in the Rocky Mountain and Coast States of the Union, but to talk of interior Alaska as a land inviting early agricultural settlement and development is utterly ridiculous. Great areas of the Tanana and Yukon Basin, the Valley of the Susitna, and even of the Kuskokwim, in spite of the eternal frost that penetrates them to great depths, will in all probability, under proper treatment, produce in the clear short summer crops of hardy grains and vegetables. Such crops are being successfully grown to a limited extent in a number of places to supply local demands in localities whose isolation renders prices abnormally high.

The testimony is that $7.50 per day was the wage paid on the Government experiment station at Rampart on the Yukon, and at this rate of wage $200 per acre was the estimate of Government experts on the cost of bringing an acre into condition Settlers are not overkeen to take up 320-acre free homesteads on lands in some of our mountain States having about the same rainfall as the interior valleys of Alaska. Settlers on rich lands under national irrigation projects in many parts of the West, reasonably accessible to markets and in a temperate climate, are finding it difficult to meet a cost of from $45 to $75 an acre for their lands completely reclaimed, though these payments are without interest and are extended over a long period of time.

The fact is that the building of Government railroads to the center of Alaska, if the low freight rates anticipated were realized, would retard rather than encourage agriculture in many sections by reducing the high prices for farm products which now make the limited production of the present profitable. A certain amount of agriculture may be carried on where potatoes sell for 5 or 10 cents a pound on the farm, and hay from $60 to $100 a ton, which would not be at all profitable if, by the competition of products brought in by rail, the price was reduced greatly below that figure. There is a future for agriculture and agricultural settlement in certain districts of the interior of Alaska in spite of the rigor of the climate, the briefness of the growing season, the frozen condition of the ground, and the high cost of preparing the soil for crops, but it is a future dependent entirely upon local markets and high prices and not to be hurried or advanced by railway construction.

WHAT THE BILL PROPOSES.

Having considered briefly some of the arguments brought forward in behalf of the pending legislation, let us consider for a moment what the bill proposes. The President is authorized to locate and designate and to build and construct standard-gauge railroads with branches so as to connect one or more of the harbors on the southern coast of Alaska with the navigable rivers in the interior and with a coal field or fields. He is also authorized to lease, purchase, or condemn railway lines already built with wharves, docks, and terminal facilities, and in carrying out and accomplishing these purposes he is authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States $35,000,000, provided he can sell bonds at 3 per cent. There is no limitation whatever on the number of miles of road which may be constructed or contracted for, leased, purchased, or condemned, and no provision as to where these lines should be located except the very general one which I have quoted. In fact, one would be very much at a loss to understand just what is proposed or contemplated if it were not for the fact that the legislation is based on the report made by the Alaskan Railway Commission and transmitted to Congress January 20 last, and published as Document No. 1346 of the Sixty-second Congress. This commission recommended the construction of 733 miles of railroad. The first item of construction, and that which is particularly urged and vigorously defended by the commission, is a line 313 miles in length extending from Chitina, on the Copper River & Northwestern, to Fairbanks. This line, to cost approximately $14,000,000, would be a branch of the Copper River & North-fields at less than a million and a half, but it adds two and western, and all freight over it would be carried over the Copper River & Northwestern from Cordova to Chitina, 132 miles. The next line proposed is a branch, or feeder, 38 miles in length, from the Copper River & Northwestern to the Bering River coal fields, at an estimated cost of about $2,000,000. The third line proposed is a 115-mile extension of the Alaskan Northern into the Susitna Valley, costing about five and a quarter million. The fourth line, a branch from the last-mentioned line, 38 miles in length to the Matanuska coal fields, at a cost of approximately one and three-quarter million. Last but not least is a line 229 miles in length from the end of the Susitna Valley line to an uncharted locality on the Kusko-kwim River, to cost $12,750,000. Three hundred and fifty-one miles, costing about $16,000,000, are feeders of the Copper River & Northwestern, and 382 miles, costing about $19,000,000, feeders of the Alaska Northern.

No one, I think, will attempt to defend, as a whole, the plan of construction thus outlined by the Alaskan Railway Commission, which this bill virtually approves. Mr. Ballaine, who has been referred to here as a warm supporter and a defender of this legislation, seems to have had difficulty in finding language strong enough to express his disapproval of much of the commission's report and recommendations; "suppression of facts, jugglery, misrepresentation," are among the mildest terms used by him repeatedly in his statement before the House committee with reference to the commission's report and their recommendations that a feeder line for the Copper River & Northwestern, "the Guggenheim road," as he calls it, 313 miles in length, from Chitina to Fairbanks, be built by the Government. The report also contemplates the building by the Government of another important fee er for the Copper River & Northwestern of 38 miles in length into the Bering River coal fields. However little or much benefit the people and the Government might derive from these great feeders to a privately owned road, it is certain that the road over which the tonnage that these Government lines would develop and provide would be greatly benefited. The Copper River & Northwestern, it is understood, is not paying at this time; with the expenditure of some fifteen millions of public money to build feeders it probably would pay well.

The extension of the Alaskan Northern from its present terminus to the Matanuska coal fields with Government money would uncoubtedly, if those fields were opened, make valuable the constructed line of that at present wholly unprofitable property. The proposition of building 229 miles of road from the vicinity of the Matanuska coal fields into the Kuskokwim Valley at a cost of nearly $13,000,000, while recommended by the commission, is admitted by the members of the commission to be a questionable enterprise at the best. Thirteen million dollars expenditure would serve a population, estimated by Mr. Brooks, of the commission, at about 4,000. Outside of the lines to the coal fields, which would cost, according to the reports of the commission, a little less than $9,000,000, the remaining authorized e penditure of $26,000,000 would serve at the outside a present white population in the interior of not to exceed 10,000 people.

WANT TO DO SOMETHING FOR ALASKA.

There are no doubt gentlemen who have worked themselves into such a state of mind with regard to Alaska that they will insist that conditions exist in this region under which it can not have proper transportation facilities unless the Government furnish it, and that therefore we must build these roals and embark on this enterprise without regard to the cost or the population to be served. I deny the soundness of the premises on which such an extreme contention is based. If provision be made whereby the two coal fields which have been mentioned can be developed, there is not the slightest excuse for the Government building railroads into the fields. I say this I do not have in mind action that would result in the alienation of the title to those coal lands, but rather legislation providing for the leasing, on any workable or practicable basis, of lands to which legal and equitable title has not passed; and judging from the past action of the Interior Department, that would constitute the major portion, or nearly all, of these lands.

Let us see what the situation affecting private construction is or would be if coal mining were possible. The railroad commission estimates that it would cost approximately $2,000,000 to build a branch from the Copper River & Northwestern to the Bering River fields by way of Lake Charlotte, 38 miles in length, including the necessary rolling stock, and it recommends such a line. It estimates the cost of constructing a road 25 one-half millions to this estimate on account of cost of terminal facilities. Mr. Richard Ryan, president of the Controller Bay Railway, scouts at the estimate of two and one-half millions for terminal facilities, and he has the best of the argument, because he knows all about the situation, while the Alaskan Railway Commission knew nothing of the proposed terminus except by hearsay. Mr. Ryan says that he can build his road and terminals for a million and three-quarters, and says, as do his backers, that they stand ready to give a bond to build the railroad and to haul coal for 50 cents a ton, or less if they can have considerable tonnage, from the Bering River coal fields to tidewater at Controller Bay.

No one appeared before either the House or Senate committees during the hearings to speak for the Copper River & Northwestern Railway, but no one can doubt, who has any knowledge of the situation, that the Copper River & Northwestern would build a branch to the Bering River coal fields, which they could probably do at a much less cost than the $2,000,000 estimated by the commission, if there were assurances that there was to be coal to haul. The saving of $8 to $10 a ton on coal bills on their present line would in itself warrant them in building the branch. The situation, as I imagine, is in no wise different, so far as the Copper River & Northwestern is concerned, than it was late in 1908 when the secretary of the company assured the Secretary of the Interior, and later the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in writing that they were ready to complete the branch from their line to the Copper River coal fields "as soon as they could obtain a reasonable assurance that the coal fields would be worked and developed."

THE MATANUSKA COAL FIELDS.

So much for the Bering River situation; now as to the atanuska. The Alaskan Railway Commission estimates the cost of a line from the present terminus of the Alaskan Northern to the Matanuska coal fields at about $5,000,000 for 115 miles, this to include equipment. The management of the Alaskan Northern estimates the cost at somewhat less for a shorter and more direct line to the Matanuska coal fields, and they reiterated in their hearings before the House and Senate committees their desire, anxiety, determination, and ability to build not only the line to the Matanuska coal fields but on through the valley of the Susitna to Fairbanks on the Tanana, if they can secure a right of way and get coal for their engines and for haul to the seaboard. They stand ready to build if the coal fields are opened for development under any conditions that will secure tonnage.

They have not built because they can not even get coal for their locomotives, and are compelled to run a gasoline tractor in a land with more coal in it than any like region in the world. Twenty-four thousand dollars' worth of timber they had cut for construction purposes, under an act authorizing them to do so, was seized by the forestry officials and held until it was washed out to sea and was lost. At the time of the hearing before the House committee on this bill the Alaskan Northern had been challenged by action of the Forest Service to show cause why certain of the company's station grounds and other rights of way along its completed section should not be rejected, because the Chugach Forest Reserve had been extended over the territory. Mr. Patrick, the attorney of the road, was led by these acts to express the opinion that the forest reserve had been established primarily for the purpose of preventing their extension.

In the midst of the difficulties which had been placed in the way of the further extension of this line by the acts to which I have referred by reason of the continued embargo on coal development, by reason of a decision that they did not succeed to the enjoyment of the right of way granted to the original organization that built the first part of the road, the Alaskan Northern, still desiring to build, applied to Congress for an extension of their time for filing maps of definite location and for completing their road. A bill was introduced and passed the House and Senate providing for such extension. It reached President Taft just before the close of the session of the summer of 1912, and at the instance of Secretary Fisher, who objected on the ground that it might in some way interfere with Government railway construction in Alaska, the President failed to give the measure his approval. In February, 1913, another bill was introduced granting an extension of three years for the filing of maps and of two years thereafter for final completion of the road. In order to meet the objections which had been urged by Secretary Fisher to the former bill, it was provided that in case the United States desired to acquire by purchase or condemnation the road contemplated, the extension granted and the right of way secured under it should not be held to constitute any asset of value owned by the company. As thus amended the bill passed the House without objection. The bill reached the Senate on March 4, 1913, and Senator Nelson asked for its present consideration. Senator La Follette asked that the bill be read. After the reading of the bill the proceedings of the Senate indicate that the following took place:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, believing that the railroads constitute the key to the control of all the great wealth of that country, and believing, as I do, that the Government should own and operate the railroads of Alaska, I must interpose an objection to the present consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

There are gentlemen urging this legislation with the claim that private enterprise will not build railroads in Alaska, therefore the Government must. The record I have just read and the record of the hearings do not bear out any such contention.

During the Senate hearings on Alaskan railroad bills last summer Mr. Jemmett, treasurer of the Alaskan Northern Railway, quoted Delegate Wickersham as having said:

We have power to build railroads in Alaska, but after the President of the United States in 1908 withdrew all the coal lands in Alaska every incentive for building railroads was taken away and all the railroad building was stopped.

Mr. Jemmett, speaking for the Alaskan Northern, said that if they could know something definite even late this fall—meaning the fall just passed—they could have their road into Matanuska by the end of 1914—by the beginning of 1915 at the very outside. Mr. Boland, of the Alaskan Northern, made a statement before the House committee to the effect that private capital could have the road built, if they were permitted to build it, before the Government machinery could complete its plans for construction. All through the hearings Messrs. Patrick and Boland gave every assurance that could be reasonably asked, assurance confirmed by the logic of the situation, that their railroad would be promptly extended if right of way were granted and there could be any assurance of tonnage from the coal mines.

THE LINE TO FAIRBANKS.

I have briefly outlined the reasons why I feel confident that private enterprise will build promptly into the coal fields if they are opened for development. I am frank to say that there is not equal assurance of the immediate construction of a line through to Fairbanks or some other point on the navigable waters of the Tanana or the Yukon, but the fact that the Alaskan Northern seeks a right of way into that region, that those in position to speak on behalf of its owners say they will build into the region, while not conclusive, is reasonable assurance of such construction. The Copper River & Northwestern has always had Fairbanks or some other point on the interior rivers as its objective point. The people behind that road unquestionably have funds at their command for construction. The growing importance, not only of the Yukon and Tanana Basins but the development of the intervening country prompt and urge building of the extension, and seem to make it reasonably probable, if not absolutely certain, that, with coal mines operating, this line which the commission recommended will be built by private capital at an early day.

But assuming for the sake of argument that, with the opening of the coal fields, the building of the lines, which would be certain to follow to tap them, there should be no immediate construction into the Tanana or Yukon Valleys, that would be time enough to consider the necessity or the advisability of Government aid or construction. If it vere deemed wise that we should clinch the matter immediately, there can be no sort of question but what assistance in the way of relief for a few years from taxation, possibly the guaranty of interest for a time on half of the cost of construction, would be all that would be necessary to assure construction into the interior. As to construction into the valley of the Kuskokwim, as contemplated by the commission on whose report this legislation was based, such construction, for the present at least, would be the wildest and most foolish extravagance-hundreds of miles of road, millions of dollars of expenditure, for development of bleak regions having less population than many communities in western States now without railroad facilities to which such facilities could be afforded for one-tenth the cost.

BAILROAD SAID TO OBJECT TO IT.

Some gentlemen have urged this legislation on the ground that the railroads already in Alaska were opposed to it, as though that constituted a good argument in its favor or clinched the fairy tale that there is a monopoly which prevents further railroad building. What are the facts in this regard, as shown by the hearings? Mr. O. L. Dickeson, president and general manager of the White Pass & Yukon Railway, does not like the idea of the Government building a railroad into the interior of Alaska to connect with the Yukon, because his railroad, only 20 miles of which is in American territory, reaches the upper Yukon and by boat partly serves and expects to further serve the country of the central Yukon and Tanana. Mr. Dickeson was very frank in his statement that he did not like to compete with a Government railroad. He had a perfect right to make that statement; but no one would, I assume, consider that statement either as an argument for or against the building of the proposed roads by the Government if it were otherwise considered wise to do it.

Richard Ryan, of the Controller Bay Railroad, expressed no objection whatever to the building of Government railroads in Alaska, provided he was not compelled to compete with a Gov-If it were absoernment-owned road into the Bering coal field. lutely necessary to build a Government road into the Bering coal field in order to properly develop it, then we could very properly disregard Mr. Ryan's protest, but as Mr. Ryan has every confidence that he can raise the million and three-quarters necessary for the building of a road into the Bering coal fields, and as, in any event, he would probably have the competition of a road built by the Copper River & Northwestern, Mr. Ryan's protest as to the lack of necessity for Government expenditure in a way that would defeat his enterprise is entitled to consideration, not so much on account of Mr. Ryan as on behalf of all the people whose interests would be best served by having privately owned roads whose rates we have the right to fix. The officials of the Alaskan Central Railroad protest, and very naturally, against a proposal that the Government shall build a feeder to the Guggenheim road 313 miles in length, at a cost of $14,000,000, extending into a region into which they expect to build and which they can reach, in their opinion and in mine, by their line, to the greater advantage of Alaska. These officials also very naturally resented the assumption that it was necessary for them to give up their enterprise and for the Government to extend their line because they could not do it themselves. They took occasion to point out how the tying up of the coal fields, the difficulties with regard to securing material from the lands adjacent to their road, and the prohibition on their securing right of way had been the obstacles to their extension, and that they were willing and ready to build on if allowed to do so.

Furthermore, when Secretary Fisher suggested to them that the Government buy their road, they expressed willingness to sell it, if the Government should insist upon it, the price to be fixed by three appraisers appointed in the usual way. So far as the Copper River & Northwestern road, the so-called Guggenheim and Morgan road, is concerned, as I have said, no representative of the road appeared at the hearings; no statement was made with regard to their position relative to this legislation. I can imagine, however, how the owners and projectors of that line enjoy themselves as they read of the efforts being made through the passage of this bill to make a property, on which they are said to have expended nearly $20,000,000, and which is currently reported has never paid, very valuable to them by the expenditure of $16,000,000 of the people's money to build feeders to bring grist to their mill. Some of the gentlemen who appeared before the committees were quite emphatic in their statements about some of the things proposed under this legislation. Mr. Boland, of the Alaska Northern, the Seward road, made the following observation relative to the refusal to allow the passage of the bill for a right of way for his road. After saying that the failure to allow them a right of way penalized their road as no other road on the continent, he said:

Not only would this road (the Alaska Northern) develop all Alaska, but letting it alone, letting it enjoy the same rights and privileges that go abegging to all other roads, would build up, without one cent of expense to the Public Treasury, the only business rival capable of wresting Alaska from the Guggenheim control, if that syndicate be, in fact, the menace to the life of the Nation so graphically pictured in this and other hearings. (See p. 342, House hearings.)

Mr. Ballaine, who has been quoted as favoring this legislation, makes this observation with regard to the recommendations of construction on which it is based:

In that very recommendation is the snare that has been set to lead the Government to buy the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad and thereby take a white elephant off the hands of the Guggenheims at an exorbitant figure.

I have no disposition to embarrass the proposed legislation by appealing to prejudices against wealthy men or successful corporations, but I can not help remarking how extraordinary it is that gentlemen who have made something of a specialty of baiting certain corporations in Alaska should be such stanch supporters of a proposition which, if carried out, would be of such vast benefit to corporations like the Alaskan Syndicate and the Alaska Northern Railway. I could easily imagine what some of these gentlemen would say were the case reversed; had others stood in the way of granting a right of way to the principal rival of the Alaskan Syndicate; had others proposed building great feeders for the Alaskan Syndicate road at the expense of the people.

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE.

I would not oppose this legislation if I believed there was no other way under which Alaska could secure, within a reasonable time, needed railway facilities; I oppose it because it is wrong in principle, because, if the principle were correct, it proposes a plan unbusinesslike and dangerous to the last degree, and because it is entirely unnecessary. What Alaska needs is the opening of her coal mines; they must be opened, no matter who builds the railroads. The propositions of this bill could not be carried out without coal, therefore the first thing to do is to open and develop the coal fields. Let the Interior Department patent such lands as individuals have asserted legal claim and title to under the law, if any such there be, and report adversely on the balance of the cases and let us know where we stand in Without waiting for this to be done let Congress pass a workable leasing bill without prejudice to the claims heretofore asserted. Let such a bill provide, as the coal-leasing bill to which I have heretofore referred did, that the United States should have the right to take, for the use of its Army and its Navy at a reasonable price, such coal mined from the leased lands as it may need. Let the bill contain every necessary safeguard and protection for the public, the Government, and the consumer. Pass such a bill and the transportation question will promptly settle itself.

There are gentlemen who are supporting this legislation who claim to believe that the Government ought not to part with its title to coal lands in Alaska; that the coal should be mined under a leasing system; and who fail to grasp the fact that if this legislation passes the hope of securing a leasing bill has gone glimmering and we shall be right back, so far as Alaska s concerned, to the old system of individual ownership, against which such a furore has been raised in the past few years. I do not make this statement without full and sufficient reason for doing so; the logic of the situation is conclusive evidence. The gentlemen from Alaska who are pressing this legislation do not believe in, do not want leasing legislation. It is proposed to pass this legislation through a combination of those who do and those who do not believe in leasing legislation. If the bill passes and railway construction begins, the cry will go up that these railroads must have coal. How are they to get it? If in the meantime the Interior Department has not issued patents on the few claims which are currently reported as being free from taint or fraud so that coal can be mined from them, or if such claims are not immediately accessible, or the coal entirely satisfactory, where is the coal to come from? Who is to get it out?

The gentlemen who have been clamoring for years for lease legislation will perhaps introduce bills which, under conditions then likely to exist, will in all human probability be defeated in one body of Congress or the other. But they must have coal in Alaska for these Government railways. Will the Government open a mine and mine coal for the use of the Navy and for the use of the Government and privately owned railroads? That is the next step in Government socialism and paternalism being proposed, and it would be infinitely more logical than the action now proposed. Of course the project would be expensive, wasteful, unsatisfactory, inadequate, and then what? a demand, which would ultimately be successful, that the coal laws now on the statute books of Alaska be allowed to operate; that the claims which have heretofore been denied be reconsidered or new claims allowed or asserted to the same lands, and thus restore exactly the condition of private ownership which would have resulted had there never been any excitement over the coal fields of Alaska.

WHAT THE LEGISLATION WOULD ACCOMPLISH.

This, then, Mr. Chairman, is what the passage of this bill will accomplish: It will embark the Nation on a limitless and extravagant scheme of transportation, ownership, and operation, including terminals, wharves, ports, and steamship lines, greatly to the benefit of those now owning lines in Alaska, to which the Government lines would be feeders. It would result in the opening and operation of Government coal mines for a time, at least; it would eventually restore conditions of private ownership of coal lands in Alaska against which there has been a great popular movement for years. As a necessary corollary and result of these things, it would involve the Nation in bickerings and scandals, in criminations and recriminations, compared with which the so-called Ballinger-Pinchot controversy would appear as a tropical zephyr beside an Arctic hurricane.

The only portion of our people who can be benefited by this legislation would be those communities in the Pacific northwest whose trade and business would be temporarily increased; some communities in Alaska that would temporarily boom; the owners of the present railways in Alaska. As for the balance of the country and the remainder of our people, there never could be a moment after the legislation became a law, if it did, that its effects, direct and indirect, present and remote, would not be harmful and regrettable.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. FALCONER. We have had a fine line of entertainment by gentlemen who have spoken on this measure, and the gentleman [Mr. SMALL] who has just resumed his seat has been somewhat engaging, in that he still continues to labor under the spell produced by the eloquence of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris]. As a matter of fact, the speech of the gentleman from Oklahoma characterized a number of speeches that have been delivered against this bill, and the common characteristic, Mr. Chairman, is that the facts applied, whether from governmental sources or not, were so far-fetched that they had lost their identity in the application, and I think they were generally misapplied.

The previous speaker asked very pointedly and repeatedly "Why advocate Government-built railroads in Alaska when it has never been done in any other part of the United States? My reply, sir, is that if the gentleman knew anything about the topographic and the geodetic features of the country and the conditions obtaining that prevent return for individual effort in Alaska he would know one good reason for the passage of this Further, does the gentleman not know that a vast land empire has been dedicated to railroad pioneering in the United

I wish to observe in opening, sir, that the chief feature of the opposing arguments suggests that one of the prime objects of attack on the bill is to oppose the principle involving Government ownership of railroads. Not a Member who has spoken in opposition has concluded his remarks without holding up to the House the dangers of even an experiment in the matter of Government ownership of transportation lines. The minority report opposing the passage of this bill, which was so thor-oughly "Lenrooted" by the gentleman from Wisconsin, indi-cates that its authors are fearful of the uncertain things which might happen should the Government embark on railroad building in Alaska.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to these gentlemen that their solicitude is very light when compared to the interest and solicitude of the Alaska Syndicate. I should not find it necessary to remind the gentlemen that the United States Government now owns and operates the telegraph lines and wireless stations in and the marine cable running to Alaska, and without injury to the country

It is my desire, Mr. Chairman, to analyze the situation here in Congress as it now presents itself to me.

I believe the Member who exercises the final vote on this measure votes either for the interests of the country or for the interests of the Guggenheim-Morgan syndicate.

I do not impugn the motives of any Member of this House. I do believe, however, irrespective of any Member's opinion or however honest any Member may be in his opinion, in the final analysis a vote for this bill is in the interests of the people of this country and a vote against this bill is in the interests of the Alaska Syndicate.

The statement may seem extraordinary, but Alaska, with her extraordinary experiences, justifies the assertion.

We read much these days in condemnation of the anarchistic tendencies of the times, and no man who possesses the elements of true American citizenship condones the offense, but for double-distilled, concentrated, and truly focused anarchy the history of Alaska refers us to the record of the Alaska Syndicate and its vicious and law-breaking operations in the vicinity of Katalla and Valdez.

When the gentleman from Wisconsin was delivering his able address on this subject and reciting some of the outrages of the Alaska Syndicate and the extraordinary means employed by that company in shutting out a competitive company from building a road east from Valdez, Members of the House were amazed that such arrogance and defiance of law would be

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: I hope you will see your way clear to support the Alaska railroad bill for the opening of Alaska for the benefit of people of humble means.

I spent eight years in Alaska, and can truthfully say that the United States Government is the only party that can build and operate a railroad in that country, for the simple reason that the United States is the only one that has or can afford a standing army to protect the builders.

I was in Katalia in 1907 when certain powerful interests had an army of several hundred men, armed, which destroyed and confiscated property of people trying to build a road to the Bering coal fields, Representatives of the same interests found it necessary to commit murder in Valdez the same year to keep another road from building to Fairbanks. These statements can be verified by anyone familiar with that country.

I will close by admonishing you to remember, in making appointments for the judiclary and other offices in Alaska, that there is positively no difference between a Guggenheim Democrat and a Guggenheim Republican. Yours, very truly,

July 3, 1907, the Guggenheim forces, under Superintendent of Construction McClure, assisted by Mike Sullivan and Black Sullivan, attempted to build a railway trestle through the center of the Bruner properties, being about 1,000 feet from the original Guggenheim right of way. The Bruner employees, under orders of Superintendent Dwyer, superintendent of construction, and Hampton, civil engineer, repulsed the Guggenheim men with cables, 300 feet long, with rails attached. One end of the cables was anchored to what is known as a "deadman"; the other end of the cables was operated by a donkey engine. On July 5 Superintendent McClure and a force of Guggenheim men commenced building blockhouses and breastworks preparatory to taking possession of the "deadman." On the evening of the same day Black Sullivan, with 700 men, receiving from $5 to $10 per hour, charged the Bruner employees who were defending the "deadman." Mike Sullivan, with about 200 men, charged from the rear, resulting in a pitched battle, in which numbers of men were so badly injured that they needed hospital attendance. The Bruner forces were armed with pick handles; the Guggenheim forces with firearms, dynamite, and pick handles. Peterson, a house carpenter for the Bruner side, an expert swordsman, put Black Sullivan in the hospital for several weeks. Hoover, master mechanic for the Guggenheims, attempted to throw dynamite among the Bruner employees. Oscar Breedman, known in Alaska as Crooked Ole, furnished the Guggenheims and cutting all cables, Mike Sullivan and the Guggenheim men under him took possession of all the Bruner pile drivers, and also put men to destroy the Bruner mess house and other buildings. On July 6 the Guggenheim "man catcher" (employer of labor) offered all the Bruner employees work at increased wages. Bruner then ceased construction. In the following October the Guggenheims closed down at Katalla and moved to Cordova, immediately reducing the wages of their employees work at increased w

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Copper River & Northwestern Railway did considerable grading and tunneling in Keystone Canyon in 1906, then transferred its operations to Katalia in the spring of 1907. In August, 1907, the Alaska Home Railway started from Valdez. Soon afterwards the Copper River & Northwestern Railway Co. put about 75 men at work in Keystone Canyon. Early in September, 1907, Edward Hasey was appointed special deputy United States marshal at the request of George C. Hazelett, general agent of the Copper River & Northwestern Railway Co., and was sent to the canyon under pay of that company, which also paid several guards with him. Hasey was known as a guman. He had killed two men. Soon after going to the canyon he wrote Hazelett, asking for four Winchester repeating rifles, with ammunition. Hazelett sent the guns, with a letter instructing Hasey to hold the canyon at any cost. Hasey and General Foreman O'Neill were instructed to post notices sent them by General Manager Hawkins, warning all but employees out of the canyon and to keep out all but employees. O'Neill and Hasey chased out several men. The Alaska Home Railway grading forces approached Keystone Canyon, 14 miles from Valdez, late in September. Entrance to the canyon is by a railroad through a cut 200 feet long through a headland that projects from the mountain side into Lowe River, about 150 feet beyond the inner end of the cut. Hasey had living tents and had erected a barricade about waist high. The cut contained "a survey" (a lookout), and is reached from an open valley on a filled grade. In the forenoon of September 25, about 140 of the Alaska Home Railway men, led by a foreman and an engineer of the party, marched into this cut with working tools, intending to go past the Copper River & Northwestern Railway operations and work beyond until the differences were settled. The Alaska Home Railway forces had no firearms. O'Neill, leader of the Copper River & Northwestern Railway forces, warned them back, but they proceeded, and when the van of the squad rounded the curve in sight of the barricade, Hasey began shooting with a Winchester. The Alaska Home Railway men turned and ran back. Hasey continued shooting. Five men were shot, and one died afterwards. Phillips was shot in the back and permanently crippled. Hasey was indicted for murder in the second degree, and four indictments were returned against him for assault with intent to kill. The cases were taken to Juneau on account of prejudice in Valdez. Hasey was acquitted of the murder charge, but was later convicted of the Phillips assault. He served 18 months at the United States penitentiary on McNeills Island. The liability of the Copper River & Northwestern Railway Co, in the Phillips case was fixed by showing that Hasey, though a deputy marshal, was paid by that company, and that he acted under its orders as its agent. He admitted that the company paid all the costs in Hasey's defense in the criminal cases. The verdict for Phillips was $15,000, later reduced to $10,000. There are many other striking details on file with the circuit court of appeals at San Francisco. For the printed record and brief, see case 1941, decision 198, Federal 328.

E. E. RITCHIE, Attorney for Phillips.

Note.—Mr. Ritchie is ex-mayor of Valdez and was attorney for Phillips.

Mr. Chairman, these outrages occurred in the years 1906-7, and it might be suggested by the opposition that such conditions could not exist at the present time. I will read an article appearing in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, under date of January 8, 1914, which indicates that the same lawless tactics, embracing disregard for court decisions and the rights of men, are still the chief weapons of the Guggenheims in Alaska:

AW AND GUNS FIGURE IN FIGHT FOR GOLD CLAIM—CORPORATION'S ARMED GUARDS DRIVE MINERS FROM CHICAGO BENCH ON FLAT CREEK—MEN HALED TO COURT ON TRESPASS CHARGE—DISCHARGED, THEY RETURN AND ARE ROUTED IN BATTLE WITH YUKON GOLD CO,'S POSSE—WITH DOG TEAM ONE OF THE PARTNERS TRAVELS 600 MILES, COMING TO ENGAGE COUNSEL.

The story of a fight for a $1,000,000 gold claim between two miners and a great corporation, in which armed guards, gun fights, long trails traveled by dog team, and alleged false arrests figure in a manner reminiscent of "The Spoliers," by Rex Beach, has reached Seattle from the far north. The contenders in the legal and physical battle being waged for possession of the 40-acre area of ground on Flat Creek in the Iditarod, said to contain $1,000,000, are William Knox and Samuel Adams, two well-known Alaska miners, on one side, and on the other the Yukon Gold Co., of New York, owners of the great Dawson dredges, which have climinated the pick and shovel miner from the golden mecca of 1898, and in which the Guggenheims are heavy shareholders. TRAVELS 600 MILES BY DOG TEAM.

Adams arrived in Seattle January 5 on the steamer Northwestera from Valdez, after a 600-mile trip from Iditarod city to Seward, making the journey to consult legal talent here and plan for the coming legal battle in the North. He has retained William A. Gilmore, the former mayor of Nome, who is spending the winter in this city, as his chief attorney. Mr. Adams is now in Spokane.

According to friends of Mr. Adams, the following is a brief skeleten of the story:

The Chicago bench claim on the right limit of Flat Creek is one of the richest unworked claims in Alaska, to judge from development already done. Last full Adams and Knox relocated this claim, alleging forfeiture in 1911 by Tom Aiken, the original owner, through his full-ure to do the annual assessment work. In the meantime, Aiken and his associates had leased the ground to the Yukon Gold Co.

REPULSED BY ARMED GUARD.

On October 14 of last year Adams and all his men then at work on the rich claim were arrested at the behest of officers of the corporation and haled into court at Iditarod on a charge of trespass. After trial, during which feeling ran high and physical violence was imminent, Adams and his associates were acquitted.

Jubilant over their legal victory, they returned to the claim on Flat Creek to resume work, only to find the property surrounded by armed guards of the Yukon Gold Co. There was a pitched battle, in which Adams and his men were routed. Adams returned to Iditarod city and on December 3i last filed suit in the district court there to oust the Yukon Gold Co. from possession of the claim.

In November Adams started from Iditarod city by dog team and traveled 600 miles over the snow to Seward to catch a steamer for Seattle. Word was received in the city by his friends yesterday that suit had been filed for him and his associates by lawyers in Iditarod city for $100,000 damages for false arrest.

MINE UNDER ARMED GUARD.

MINE UNDER ARMED GUARD,

The legal battle for the possession of the mine will be contested in Iditared city next July.

Attorney Gilmore will return to Nome on the first steamer up, and go at once from there to Iditared to take personal charge of the case. At present the mine is in possession of the Yukon Gold Co., which maintains an armed patrol there.

THIS LEGISLATION GENERALLY DEMANDED.

Mr. Chairman, there are thousands of men in my State who know of and recite obstacles to individual effort in Alaska, and they urge as the most effective remedy Government ownership of railroads in Alaska.

This Territory is so exceedingly rich that little niches in the mountain crevice or a few acres of placer, coveted by combinations and syndicates, have been the objects over which armed conflicts have taken place between uneven forces, to the exclusion of the individual.

The country is calling on this Congress to adopt this measure, and, Mr. Chairman, I wish here to insert resolutions adopted by labor and commercial organizations of the West and a joint memorial resolution by the Legislature of the State of Washing. ton; and in this connection I wish to say that other resolutions received have been presented from time to time to the committee and to the Department of the Interior:

Resolutions adopted by Central Labor Council of Seattle.

Whereas bills have been introduced in both Horses of the American Congress providing for the governmental construction of railway lines in the Territory of Alaska; and Whereas the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior have publicly indorsed the principle involved in these bills; and

Resolved, That the Central Labor Council of Seattle and vicinity hereby indorse the attitude of President Woodrow Wilson and Secretary Franklin K. Lane in their attitude toward these measures, and we earnestly recommend that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Washington lend their active and aggressive support in favor of the passage of these bills, which we believe will result in great benefit to the people, not only of the State of Washington and Alaska, but of the entire United States; be it further

Mr. Chairman, I wish here to quote from a report of Mr. Seth Mann, the personal representative of the President, who made a special trip to Alaska in 1913. Regarding the advisability of building a Government railroad in Alaska, Mr. Mann states:

special trip to Alaska in 1913. Regarding the advisability of building a Government railroad in Alaska, Mr. Mann states:

There are two primary requirements for the opening up and development of Alaska—first, the construction of railroads, roads, and trails, and, second, the opening up of the coal fields. These two projects should go forward with equal steps, since each is dependent upon the other.

I am convinced that this work of the building of railroads, as well as the construction of roads and trails, should be carried forward by the Government directly. There is nothing definite or certain in regard to the building of railroads by private enterprise, either unalded or with Government assistance. The traffic to support Alaska railroads must be in large part developed by the road itself through the settlement of the country, induced by increased transportation facilities. When the Bering River and Matanuska coal fields are opened by appropriate legislation, railroads to these fields would no doubt be constructed by private enterprise. The opening of these coal fields is, however, a separate problem, and until that problem is satisfactorily solved there will not be sufficient coal traffic to induce the building of railroads to the fields. It may take some considerable time to enact legislation that will result in the satisfactory working of these great deposits. In the meanwhile it must be assumed that railroad development by private enterprise to the coal fields would be delayed until it became apparent that the legislation would result in the immediate opening of the coal measures.

Alaska needs at once one and probably two railroads. One should run from the coast to the Tanana and the Yukon, and the other from the coast in a northwesterly direction at least as far as the valley of the Kuskokwim River. I can not believe that any railroads of this length will be constructed by private enterprise for many years to come. If this be true, such development of that portion of Alaska beyond the Chugach Mountains remain in the field, if not twice as long, at least two months longer than he can at the present time. He must enter the field under present conditions late in the year and return again from a month to two months earlier than would be necessary if these railroads were built, since he can not risk the severities of the Alaskan winter which may prove fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal resources of the interior of Alaska are its mineral wealth. It is the universal opinion of all Alaskans and of the Government scientists that this wealth is prodigious. It is also evident that it can not and will not be developed until railroad transportation through the country is afforded. It is also the general opinion that the building of the road will cause this development to proceed at once. In other words, the building of a railroad must precede the mineral development of interior Alaska.

Transportation by river is closed for about seven months in the year; the transportation is had only by dog team or in some cases by stage line, but the expense of this method is so great that no freighting to any extent is performed during these seven months. The construction of railroads would open up transportation all the year round.

The harbors of Seward, Valdez, and Cordova on the south central coast of Alaska are open during all of the year, and any or all of them may be used as coast terminals.

Mr. Chairman, I am informed by reliable men who have spent

Hons. J. A. Falconer,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, representing every substantial business and commercial interest thereon, views with gratification the relief which Congress is about to give the Territory of Alaska in the shape of legislation permitting of the development of its resources, a development which is vital and of tremendous importance to the commercial welfare of the entire Pacific coast. This organization urges you to exert your utmost influence to unlock the vast wealth of that Territory by the support of a program which will insure transportation facilities, and without which no material development can take place. We believe that this is a moral obligation fairly resting upon the Government, in view of its previous attitude to that Territory.

ASSOCIATED CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

From the perspective of distance in foreign governmental affairs, it appears the height of wisdom on the part of the United States to engage in this enterprise.

Premier Richard McBride, in the New York Times of August 20, 1913, discussing railroad building in Alaska by the United States Government, said:

States Government, said:

Of course I am not in a position to criticize any action Congress might take in the matter, but as I have been associated with the Government of a country that borders on Alaska for some 13 years, I have come to know something of the value of that Territory. I have always said that the American people had not risen to a true appreciation of the wealth of Alaska.

Our Government is helping to build the Pacific & Great Eastern Railway from Vancouver northeast directly across British Columbia. Over 4,000 men are working on the line. The money for the work is all in the banks. I can conceive of no circumstances that might arise to obstruct its completion. This will be extended from Fort George to the Peace River country, approximately 700 miles north of the fortyninth parallel.

ALASKAN RESOURCES.

Mr. Chairman, the resources of Alaska are exceptional. The land which in the sixties was referred to as "the frozen North" was rejected by men of affairs as a great frigid, ice-covered district. Later man obtaining brought district. Later, upon obtaining knowledge of the country, its great possibilities fired the imagination of alert men and started a great movement to obtain possession of the riches of the district

After a few years of extraordinary activity some of the richest mineral deposits in the country were in the hands of great corporations, and it was evident that if their activity continued Alaska would be in the grip of a few cruelly cold and grasping men. It became necessary for the administration to investigate. Information obtained through the Forestry Department, at the head of which was Mr. Pinchot, led to an Executive order by Mr. Roosevelt, in 1906, withdrawing all coal lands from entry; and I am of the opinion that had that order not been issued we should not to-day be considering Government ownership and control of railroads in Alaska, but the country as it turned to its dictionary of economics would find the term "Alaska resources" to be a synonym for "Alaska Syndicate interests."

Alaska, with her magnificent distances, placed on the map of the United States, with Ketchikan at Charleston, S. C., and Juneau at Knoxville, Tenn., places Skagway in southern Kentucky, Cordova at St. Louis, Mo., Fairbanks in northern Iowa, Nome in South Dakota, Point Barrow in northern Minnesota, Seward in western Missouri, and the western extremity of the Aleutian Islands northwest of Los Angeles, Cal. In other words, distances in Alaska embrace the distances involved from the northern to the southern boundary of the United States and from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts.

Alaska, with an area of 586,000 square miles, equal to that of 20 States; with more than twice as much water line as the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States; with her vastly greater open harbor shore line than the Scandinavian Peninsula; with agricultural possibilities that are a revelation to the average person—the great Susitna Valley alone being 80 miles wide and 125 miles long—and greatly in excess of those of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Finland, which countries have 12,000,000 population; with grazing lands north of the Yukon for 10,000,000 reindeer, and south of the Yukon for as many cattle; with coal fields of extensive areas, exceeding 12,000 square miles, and with a probable area of several times that amount, as suggested by Dr. Brooks before the Senate committee; with merchantable timberlands exceeding 20,000,000 acres (see Kellogg, associate forester, Forest Service Bulletin No. 81, pp. 13); with fisheries, the greatest in the world, 4,450,000 cases of salmon in 1913, each case having forty-eight 1-pound cans, besides quantities of salted and frozen salmon, herring, and halibut; with seal-fur products, running into fortunes every year-Alaska with these untold riches is waiting development.

Preliminary estimates of Alaska mineral production for 1913, made by Alfred H. Brooks, of the United States Geological Survey, are at hand. Final figures will not make much change in the estimate. They are as follows:

Total mineral output for the year is $18,900,000. Of this sum $15,450,000 was in gold and $3,014,000 in copper. The silver product was $220,000; that of marble, gypsum, tin, and so forth, about $220,000. The total figures show a slight decrease from the yield of the previous year, due not to a shrinkage in mine values, but to unusual conditions.

Eight copper mines and 27 lode gold mines have been in sucresult copper mines and 27 lode gold mines have been in successful operation during the year. New placer districts of great promise have been discovered. Coal in quantity for thorough testing as to quality has been brought out, both from the Bering River and the Matanuska fields. Government tests are in progress. Some oil wells operating pumping plants near Katalla have produced petroleum which was refined locally and marketed for local area. keted for local use. The report is an encouraging one and emphasizes the need of early railroad construction so that the development of such large and well-tested sources of national wealth may go rapidly forward.

Mr. Chairman, with such reports as this available and with conclusive evidence that Alaska excels in vast riches, still there are gentlemen who fail to grasp the importance of this Territory.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] some time ago introduced a resolution to the effect that the United States open negotiations with Great Britain to consider the advisability of selling or exchanging southeastern Alaska with Great Britain for a consideration.

Southeastern Alaska: Treadwell mine, 5,000 tons daily capacity, has paid $55,000,000 and has ore blocked out that will last 50 years and net over $100,000,000.

Three prospects developed to the point of certain operation, with a daily tonnage of twenty, twelve, and ten thousand tons, respectively, and the largest mine with ore blocked out guaranteeing 100 years' run, are located within 4 miles of Tread-gross output of these combined properties will equal $35,000,000 per year, and is all in southeastern Alaska, which the gentleman from Maryland would trade off to a foreign

THE COAL PROBLEM.

One of the great resources of Alaska that is now engaging the attention of the people of the country is coal, and as it is an important factor in the commerce of the country and soon to be a subject for consideration at the hands of Congress, I wish to present some views on the subject. Alaska has the only anthracite coal on the Pacific coast and the only high-grade coking coal. The data gathered in the Interior Department would indicate that Alaska has the largest coal fields in Amer-ica, and the importance of the fuel question and its bearing on the commerce of the country demand that this resource be not placed in the possession of combinations of capital, but that it shall be retained in ownership by the United States Government and developed under the direction of the United States Government by leasing or other systems. In this connection I wish to quote from the Progressive Party platform:

The coal and other natural resources of Alaska should be opened to development at once. They are owned by the people of the United States, and are safe from monopoly, waste, or destruction only while we demand that they shall neither be sold nor given and

We demand that they shall neither be sold nor given away, except under the homestead law, but while held in Government ownership shall be opened to use promptly upon liberal terms requiring immediate development.

Thus the benefit of cheap fuel will accrue to the Government of the United States and to the people of Alaska and the Pacific coast, the settlement of extensive agricultural lands will be hastened, the extermination of the salmon will be prevented, and the just and wise development of Alaskan resources will take the place of private extortion or

Regarding this subject, I wish to quote Mr. Seth Mann:

Regarding this subject, I wish to quote Mr. Seth Mann:

Two of the most important coal fields in Alaska, the Matanuska and the Bering, lie comparatively near the coast, and are readily accessible by railroad line without meeting serious difficulties of construction. Following a policy of intense conservation, these coal fields were withdrawn from location in 1906, and no development of these fields has been made, with the exception of what has been done by the Naval Department in the Bering field and what is now being done by the same department in the Matanuska field. An investigation is being made to ascertain whether this coal can be used effectively by the Navy. Coal has been brought to the coast at great expense for these experimental purposes. The high character of the coal from both of these fields, much of it approaching anthracter in quality, is vouched for by many reports from the Geological Department of the Government.

The instant question concerns the character of legislation which should be emacted in order to open these coal fields to development, it is generally conceded that the monopolization of these coal fields in the hands of a very few great operators would inevitably result if the fields were opened to location and allenation. One method of preventing this is to provide for the leasing of these coal lands by the Government, with conditions against the assignment of the leases and requiring active prosecution of the work of coal mining under them. The Government would thus retain control of the coal fields and could prevent their monopolization. The opinion is expressed by a number of Alaskans that these fields could be profitably worked under the leasing system. I am convinced that the leasing system is the best one that can be devised to prevent the monopolization of the Alaskan coal fields. At the present time, with monupalism of high-grade coal within 100 miles of the coast, the coal used in Alaskan coal is to be had.

Mr. Chairman, the leasing system is in force in New Zealand

Mr. Chairman, the leasing system is in force in New Zealand and Australia, and, although remote from commercial centers, with poor transportation facilities, it is a success, and coal from these leased fields is now being sold in American markets on our Pacific coast.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, regarding the quality of the coal tested on the cruiser Maryland, and gentlemen have persistently emphasized the significance of the unfavorable report. They have gone to the extreme of making it appear that coal was the only great natural resource and all other resources were merely incidental.

Why, sir, coal is only one factor; but since so much time has been spent on the subject, emphasizing every unfavorable feature of the report, I want to insist on getting exact information, and will now read a letter from the Bureau of Mines, signed by Mr. J. A. Holmes, Director; also a statement made by Mr. Thomas G. White, of Katalla, Alaska, regarding the mining of this coal; and further, a report of a test of Katalia coal used on board the battleship Nebraska, by Mr. Arthur Crenshaw, lieutenant, United States Navy, senior engineer, to the commanding officer:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF MINES, Washington, January 20, 1914.

Hon. J. A. Falconer, House of Representatives.

House of Representatives.

My Dear Mr. Falconer: In reply to your inquiry concerning the mining in the Bering River region of the coal tested on board the cruiser Maryland during the summer of 1913, and other matters, I beg to report as follows:

The point selected for obtaining this sample was on a single claim (the Tenino claim) on Trout Creek. This coal was taken out during October and November of 1912 and lay in sacks at the mine until the spring and summer of 1913, when it was carried down Bering River and delivered on board the cruiser Maryland for test.

The selection of this site was decided upon after a considerable amount of preliminary investigation in different parts of the field. Nevertheless the limited extent to which excavations have been made into the different coal outcrops in different parts of this field made it difficult to decide upon what might be considered the most promising location.

into the different coal outcrops in different parts of this heid made it difficult to decide upon what might be considered the most promising location.

In excavating the sample of coal (about 800 tons) to be tested on board a naval vessel the coal was taken as "run-of-mine" coal, no special effort being made to select the best and leave the other coal behind. The screens taken with the expedition for separating out the "slate," or "bone coal," were lost by the sinking of a barge off Controller Bay, and the miners therefore had neither screens nor any washing apparatus for separating the small carbonaceous slate or dirt from the coal, and hence a considerable quantity of such material was unavoidably left in the coal brought out for test.

I have no detailed information concerning either the method of testing or the results of the tests made of this "run-of-mine" coal on board the cruiser Maryland or of the washed coal at Annapolis, except that I understand that the results of the tests on the Maryland showed only about 40 per cent of the efficiency, and the test of the washed coal at Annapolis only about 75 per cent of the efficiency of Pocahontas coal. I understand, furthermore, that while this coal proved satisfactory from the standpoint of being a smokeless coal, the low efficiency which it showed, as compared with Pocahontas coal, was due mainly to the large percentage of ash resulting from the large amount of carbonaceous slate and other earthly material with the coal, and to the fact that this ash formed a slag on the grate bars which interfered with the draft.

The result of these tests should not be considered as a basis for condemning the Bering River coal field, for the reason that the black shale and other earthy material can be removed easily by washing af a cost ranging from 15 to 30 cents per ton of coal, and for the further reason that while the site from which this sample was selected was chosen with care, the coal field is undervloyed, very few excavations into the beds of coal have been made, evidence that the ash in the coals from other beds—even near-by beds—in this field would behave in a similar manner. I have known of a number of cases in other coal fields where of two beds of coal located near each other, one could could not be used in certain furnaces because the ash formed a slag on the grate bars, and the other could be used as a high-grade coal in furnaces with a forced draft and high temperature because its ash did not form a slag on the grate bars.

For these reasons, the fact that the tests on board the cruiser Maryland did not show the coal from this particular claim to be satisfactory for the purposes of the Navy, can not be considered as indicating that all the coals in the Bering River region are unsuited for use on board ships of the Navy or ordinary commercial ships. On the other hand, I feel certain that there is in the Bering River region much coal suitable for use on ships, and a larger amount of coal suitable for ordinary commercial purposse—coal of a higher grade than can be obtained elsewhere on the Pacific coast, except in the Matanuska coal field.

If the washing of most of the coals in the Bering River field proves to be necessary, an ample supply of water and favorable climatic conditions in the region will make this operation entirely practicable.

In the Matanuska coal field there is a large quantity of high-grade coal which will probably not require washing. The explorations made in that field for the Bureau of Mines during the summer and autumn of 1913 indicate the probablility that the Navy Department will be able to secure in that region a supply of high-grade coal ample for all its future needs. A sample consisting of 900 tons of coal from one of the most promising outcrops of coal in the Matanuska field was brought down to navigable waters during the present winter season. It will be ready for test on naval vessels early in the summer of this year.

There is also to be found in the Matanuska coal field a large quantity of high-grade coal suitable for coking and o 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 tons of coal yearly for nearly a century more.

In addition to the Bering River and Matanuska coal fields there are, as you know, in northern Alaska, one or more areas of bituminous coal, and in many parts of Alaska areas of lower grade or lignitic coals which will serve a useful purpose in connection with the development of local industries. Furthermore, so large a part of Alaska is still unexplored that the chances are good for discovering not only new coal fields but also other resources far beyond our present knowledge.

In response to your inquiry with reference to agricultural possibilities in the interior of Alaska, I may say that while I have not given special study to that phase of Alaskan development, yet I have seen in the valleys of the Yukon and Tanana Rivers, as in the vicinity of Fairbanks, considerable patches of wheat, oats, barley, and hay, where these crops had matured and had been harvested, where the potato crops were as fine as—and where the yield and quality of the cabbage, celery, turnip, and other market garden vegetables were superior to—those I have seen in any other country.

It is almost unbelievable to persons who have not traveled through that far northern Territory, as I have done, even up into the Arctic Circle, where the midsummer sunshine is almost continuous, that on these lands where the ground may be frozen to a depth of several hundred feet and may be covered with a considerable thickness of moss, this moss may easily be burned off, and the warm sunshine of these long Alaskan summer days will thaw out the upper part of this frozen ground and make it not only possible but practicable to grow these splendid crops during the next and succeeding years.

After seeing in many parts of Alaska what before seeing I did not believe possible, I am more confident of agricultural development in the heart of that big Territory than any of us were 30 years ago of the agricultural development, since realized, of some of our great Western States.

Respectfully,

Respectfully,

[Extract from report of a test of Katalla coal used on board of battle-ship Nebraska.]

U. S. S. NEBRASKA, San Quentin, Cal., May 3, 1908.

To COMMANDING OFFICER.

To COMMANDING OFFICER.

SIR: In accordance with a request from the equipment officer at the navy yard on Puget Sound, I have the honor to submit the following as a result of the test of 30.5 tons of Katalla coal on board this vessel, There was not enough of the coal on board to make a test in all steaming boilers, so two boilers under one stack were used for this coal, and the three remaining steam boilers under another stack were using contract coal supplied from the navy yard (Pocahontas).

The Katalla coal is a smokeless coal of a fair steaming quality. It did not clinker and will stand very little working. This coal must be fired very light and worked with a light hoe, as it will not stand slicing: 15.2 tons of Katalla coal was used to a boiler, as compared with 18.7 tons of contract coal to a boiler during the same period of time.

time.

In my opinion, this coal is well worth a further and more extensive test, as the quantity tested on board here was not sufficient to determine its efficiency as a steaming coal.

Very respectfully,

ARTHUR CRENSHAW,

Lieutenant, United States Navy, Senior Engineer.

[Statement of Thomas G. White, of Katalla, regarding mining of coal for the Government test on the Maryland.]

KATALLA, ALASKA, August 8, 1913.

The coal taken out by the Bering River coal expedition, under the charge of the Navy Department, has been delivered at Chilkat, at the mouth of the Bering River, ready for the naval test to be given it by the first-class armored cruiser Maryland.

The harbor of Controller Bay has been buoyed to define the channel, and the cruiser came into protected water behind Kanak Island on the last of July and lay there several days taking on the coal and at the same time conducting a "port test."

RECORD—HOUSE.

It is expected that the 700-odd tons of coal brought down will be sufficient to make the harbor and steaming tests under the varying well coal for naval use.

It is not thought by those here who know the way in which the coal was mined that the test is going to prove satisfactory on account of the large amount of dirt and surface debris mixed with the coal and sa indeed that the test is going to prove satisfactory on account of the large amount of dirt and surface debris mixed with the coal as it is understood here, the Bureau of Mines, under the Department of the Interior, mined the coal for the Navy Department, the latter department having no facilities for the mining of coal the mining of the coal, as well as a number of mining engineers and geological experts to make an examination of the veins and select the points where the entries were to be driven.

They proceeded at one of the Cumingham claims, in the center of the coal, as well as a number of mining engineers and the coal to make an another of the coal and the coal as the coal and the coal and in the test—not unless it is sorted and screened on board, which is not likely to be. It should, however, demonstrate, if the facts in regard to the mining are disclosed, that the coal is suitable for the use of the Navy.

I do not wish to cast any reflection on the Navy Department or those representing this department in the field on account of the apparent willful carelessness in the mining of the coal. As I understand it, the Navy Department had nothing to do with this part of the work.

The mining and transportation of coal from the veins in the mountains, some 20 miles back from the sea, to tidewater, where it can be loaded on shipboard without the construction and development of lines of water or land transportation, or both, is not an easy task. The difficulty will be better appreciated when the cost per ton of the coal delivered to the Maryland is known.

The hardship experienced by those who have discovered and prospected and developed this coal field will be better understood if the history of the Bering coal expedition is ever published.

However, the difficulties of transportation afford no excuse for the mining and sacking of 'ons of rocks, shale, and dirt, and the masquerading of this as con!

It is thought that the well-known preference of ex-Secretary of the Interior Fisher for the Matanuska coal field and his plans for the building of 200 miles of Government railroad to reach this field have had something to do with the poor sample of coal furnished to the Maryland for a test, upon the result of which will depend in some considerable measure the plans of the Navy for the future use of this coal. Undoubtedly a much better sample of coal can be mined from the very opening from which this coal was taken, and if it is found that there has been any intentional effort to depreciate the value of the coal from this field it is to be hoped that the facts will be brought to light and the scheme traced to its source. and the scheme trace Yours, truly, TEMPERATURE.

The gentlemen who signed the minority report, together with other gentlemen opposing this measure, were greatly exercised by certain reports involving temperature, climate, and agricultural features of the country.

For the benefit of these gentlemen I will say that Point Barrow, the northernmost point of Alaska, is the warmest place on the globe the same distance north of the Equator, and Sitka, in southeast Alaska, is the warmest place on the globe the same distance north of the Equator.

The following table will make interesting comparisons. The lowest temperature of which the United States Weather Bureau has any official records in the following places are:

	Trogress.
Point Barrow, Alaska (on Arctic Ocean)	-59
That Valley Alaska (on Artic Occas)	70
Fort Yukon, Alaska (north of Arctic Circle)

Skagway, St. Petersburg, Seward, Cordova, Helsingfors, Stockholm, Christiania, and Bergen have practically the same latitude. The harbor of Christiania is a frozen harbor from 30 to 60 days a year, necessitating the use of an ice-breaking boat; whereas Cordova, Katalla, Seward, Portage Bay, and Haines Mission are never icebound.

These conditions of climate and temperature are due to the Japan current.

I call special attention of the gentleman from Florida to the above table

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it your contention that you will grow oranges and grapefruit there?

Mr. FALCONER. No, sir; but I wanted to get into the convolutions of the gentleman's brain the fact that Alaska is not [Applause.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. I understood you to say that the thermometer goes lower in Florida than it does in Alaska.

Mr. FALCONER. The record of the Weather Bureau shows that there is no record of Cordova showing any weather below zero, and the record in Tallahassee, Fla., shows that it has been two or three degrees below zero.

And, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mon-DELL] exercised himself greatly because there is frost and ice in Alaska. Why, I will say for the benefit of the gentleman that chart No. 5 of the Weather Bureau report for 1912, carrying the map of Wyoming, has written in large type across the west-ern half the words, "Liable to killing frosts any day in the year," yet this gentleman from that jack-rabbit-inhabited, cayuse-ridden country shudders at the thought of Alaska.

The United States Weather Bureau further reports:

The United States Weather Bureau further reports:

The most northerly agricultural valley in Alaska is the Tanana Valley, around Fairbanks, and the lowest temperature the Government has any record of is 65° below zero. That is the same temperature as at Miles City, Mont., and also in the Milk River country of Montana, where the Government is spending millions on irrigation projects, and eastern Montana has well demonstrated that it has one of the best agricultural stations in the United States. The lowest temperatures on the southern coast of Alaska are less than the lowest temperatures on the southern coast of the United States. It has been 25° below zero in Oklahoma, 29° below in Missouri, and 2° below in Florida, while at Cordova, Alaska, there is no record of even as low as zero.

The average length of the crop-growing season of Fairbanks, Alaska, in the last 5 years is 105 days. I mean by that the summer season between killing frosts. The average season at Ellensburg, Wash., Kittitas Valley, is only 90 days, and yet that is an agricultural valley. The county has a population of 23.000, with $6.00,000 in bank deposits, and claims to be the richest county per capilla in the United States. Many other agricultural regions have a crop-growing season shorter than at Fairbanks, while in all Alaska they have the advantage of the long days, with almost continuous sunlight for the growing period in the Tanana Valley.

AGRICULTURE.

AGRICULTURE.

The gentleman from Oklahoma spent much of his fire in quoting data from the Agricultural Department to sustain his argument against the agricultural possibilities of the country. Mr. Ballaine while before our committee quoted from Mr.

Georgeson, too, and I insert the following, from page 8, Hearings before the House Committee on the Territories

Ings before the House Committee on the Territories:

Prof. Georgeson, who is in charge of the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska—one at Sitka, one at Fairbanks, one at Rampart, and one at Kodiak—has carried on experiments since 1898. Prof. Georgeson is a Dane, a man of fine education. He was connected with the Agricultural College of Kansas until he was assigned to this work in Alaska. He is an intelligent and conservative man. Prof. Georgeson has had not only the advantages of his investigations in Alaska, but also the experiences in his own country, Denmark, and in Norway, and Sweden, where he has traveled extensively. The climatic conditions in Alaska are identical with the climatic conditions in Norway, Finland, Denmark, and Sweden, in the same latitudes. We have here on the southern coast of Alaska the Japan current. They have there in northwestern Europe the Gulf Stream. Those are the tempering influences that control the climate.

Quoting again from report of Mr. Seth Mann, beginning on page 11:

The agricultural possibilities of the interior of Alaska are a revelation to one who visits the great valleys of the Yukon and the Tanana for the first time. There are agricultural lands also in the valleys of the Copper River, the Susitna, the Kuskokwim, the Innoko, and the Koyukuk Rivers. Great level stretches are visible from the boat as one steams down the Yukon 1 nd the Tanana. The initial expense in preparing the ground is in many places considerable, reaching as high as $125 per acre. But when once prepared for cultivation the long periods of sunshine during the summer months operate like intensive cultivation and bring about rapid germination and quick maturing of the crops. The Government agricultural stations in various parts of Alaska have demonstrated many of the agricultural possibilities of the respective regions where they are located; and in the neighborhood of Fairbanks there are a number of commercial farms and gardens, which are operated at a profit and which supply the needs of the city of Fairbanks and the neighborhood, and also the demands of the steamer traffic. Excellent strawberries are grown and vegetables are raised without difficulty. The growing of various grains is as yet largely in the experimental stage. But crops of wheat, oats, barley, and rye are matured on the Government farms. The summer season is short for the maturing of wheat, but there is much less difficulty with the other grains mentioned. Some hay is cut by individual farmers. The interior of Alaska is more favorable for agricultural purposes than the regions along the coast, since there is more sunshine in the interior, and more cloudy and rainy days upon the coast. However, the city of Juneau is supplied with vegetables from local farms situated from 1 to 12 miles away from the town. It does not appear that Alaska will ever export the products of agriculture, but it seems fair to assume, with the growth of population which will result from the buildi

Mr. Chairman, if I had had the making of this bill I should have changed one feature of it. I do not believe that the President should have been directed to lease this railroad, and I hope the bill may be so changed that the Government can, if it so desires, operate the railroad, at least for some years, in order that there may be no opportunity for complaint against favoritism in service rendered. I believe the Government should operate this road and should see to it that the best possible service is given to the people of Alaska. Warehouses and dockage facili-ties should be provided, and in the event reasonable shipping rates from Alaska to the States can not be obtained, the Government should go one step further and provide a line of steamships.

Under no consideration should the coal lands be alienated from the Government, except in those individual cases when filings were made and development work done according to the spirit and letter of the law before the order of 1906 was given.

"ALASKA," "THE GREAT COUNTRY."

Mr. Chairman, "Alaska" anglicized is "the great country. Alaska, the storehouse of the people's treasure, untrammeled by advanced improvements, unhampered by transportation lines already constructed, unhindered by private ownership of lands valuable for town sites, shop and trackage facilities, and terminals, presents to the Congress of the United States the last opportunity on American soil having these advantages to build a Government railroad.

Alaska, free from all perplexing features usually attendant upon railroad building, is waiting the action of this Congress and the demand for action relative to the adoption of this bill is emphasized by press and public alike.

The people of the country look upon this enterprise as good business. Mr. Chairman, it is good business from a substantial commercial standpoint and good business for the Democratic Party. For years Alaska has been the subject of discussion in the civic organizations and periodicals of the country. To the average American citizen it has been an interesting question, but to the Alaskan and to the people who are in direct touch with Alaskans it has been a vital question.

During the last national campaign the political parties, without exception, from every platform in the country proclaimed to the people that Alaska would get due consideration in the event of success at the polls. Sir, the Democratic Party won the election, and the people have a right to expect Alaskan legislation conducive to the common good. In active contrast to the phlegmatic and comatose action of the previous administration the new administration indicates that it is embracing the opportunity of placing on the statute books of the country a bill that will mean much to the Nation and more to the pioneers of Alaska.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the minority side of the House have within the last few days indulged in the engaging entertainment of calling to the attention of the majority party certain reports and facts that would indicate that the industries country are suffering from the effects of Democratic legislation actually passed and the contemplated legislation touching on commercial lines. The old, old ghost of the last Democratic administration, in all its frightful aspects, has been held up to the Democrats of the country as a warning of what is to be expected as the result of "tariff tinkering." But, sir, the man whose memory serves him in that connection also recalls the incident of gold discovery in Alaska, and he knows that Alaska, "the great country," acted as magic in giving fortitude and new endeavor to the disheartened and prosperity to the country.

The Progressive Party unanimously stands for advanced legislation in this connection, and definitely indorsed in its platform Government ownership of railroads in Alaska in these words:

We demand, also, that extortion or monopoly in transportation shall be prevented by the prompt acquisition, construction, or improvement by the Government of such railroad, harbor, and other facilities for transportation as the welfare of the people demand.

The one thing more than any other that will result in enlivening business in this country is the Government ownership of railroads in Alaska and the general development of that great and rich Territory. [Applause.]

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, before expressing a few thoughts I have in reference to this bill, I desire to compliment the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] upon the splendid and entertaining speech in support of this measure, which he delivered two weeks ago to-day. After listening to that speech and reading it once since, I am convinced he left nothing on the subject unsaid, and those of us who speak after him can but emphasize the arguments which he made. I am further convinced that whether this bill becomes a law or not-and I believe it will become a law-the people of Alaska owe a debt of gratitude to the man who so capably and earnestly represents their interests here in Washington. [Applause.]

When I heard him say he went into the heart of Alaska and builded his home at Fairbanks when there were but three other houses there and had lived there ever since, I said to myself, He is an iron man and one of nature's natural pioneers." when I observed his strength of mind and apparent strength of body I concluded he had drawn strength from the great trees, the great valleys, and the great mountains with which he has had companionship for years. The greatest and the strongest men of ancient or modern times have been reared in the mountains, and from the mountains have drawn courage, strength,

Last Wednesday the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] pitted himself with his mirth, ridicule, and splendid talents against this bill and delivered a brilliant, telling speech, covering all the ground and leaving nothing to be said on his side of the question; and so I am convinced there is nothing of importance unsaid on either side of the subject, and in my remarks I will speak simply in a general way.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. I believe it is a progressive measure and in keeping with the spirit of the times. believe the great storehouse containing the treasures of Alaska will one day be opened to all the people of this country, and I see no reason why it should not be opened now, for there are treasures up there which our people need, treasures of gold, treasures of silver, treasures of coal, treasures of copper, treasures of tin, treasures of marble, treasures of lumber, treasures of agriculture. There are treasures in its rivers and treasures in its mountains, all of which I want the people in general to enjoy. I want them to see its sunless days and its midnight I do not want our people to go to Italy to see volcanoes, I want them to go to Alaska. I do not want them to go to Switzerland to see sublime scenery, I want them to go to Alaska. I object to our people going to Europe to spend the summer months. I want them to spend their money and their summers in our own great northern summer land.

Gentlemen tell us of the hardships in Alaska and the difficulties of this railroad task. I call their attention to the fact that there are no difficult tasks for the American people. The harder the task the more we like it. You convince a real American that the way is difficult and he is sure to want to take it. One can not think of the great expositions we have had, of the building of the Panama Canal, and the Panama Exposition now under way in California without realizing the American people will not shrink from a task simply because it is hard. We certainly should be as progressive as Russia. Slow, indifferent, and sluggish as it is, yet I am told the Russian Government has 5,000 miles of railroad in Siberia, the twin sister of Alaska; that its cost and equipments amounted to over $500,000,000; that in many places the tracks are double; that they have a branch track leading northward to the Arctic Ocean, and at that point large warehouses have been established, and when the ice breaks up in the summer wheat and many other products of the farm are carried from these to Europe and other lands; that from this great trans-Siberian railroad the Government has established stage routes into all the big and little valleys of Siberia—cold, frozen, ice-bound, moss-covered Siberia—and that all the valleys are being settled, and that 2,000,000 people have moved from western and southern Russia to Siberia, and the farming classes are settling and making Siberia one of the large producing countries of the world; that the Russian Government is building another system of railroads across this frozen country, and that there are now two ports on the Arctic Ocean, both with railroad communications.

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I have not much time, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELDER. Is it not necessary for Russia to do that in

Mr. ELDER. Is it not necessary for Russia to do that in order to get a seaport, which necessity does not exist in the

Mr. CHURCH. I do not know whether that is the reason Russia has built this railway or not, but I know it is necessary for this country to do what we propose to do in order to get up to the place where the mountains are filled with coal and gold that they tell us about, and the hills in general are full of wealth which we need and expect to get. They may have a particular reason for building their road. We have a particular reason to build ours, and I say to you the fact that they have succeeded in building their road is sufficient to convince me that the people of this great country can build ours if they want to, regardless of any difficulty. [Applause.]

Gentlemen who argue against the building of this proposed railroad in Alaska forget the strength of the American people and the times in which we live. They forget how youthful this country is and how much we have accomplished. We can no longer judge the future by the past; we must judge the future by the present. The measuring stick of yesterday will not measure with the conditions of to-day. It was only between four and five hundred years ago that the first Spanish ships landed on the North and South American shores; not more than six times the age of Members of this House. It was between two and three hundred years ago the Pilgrim fathers landed at Plymouth Rock; not more than four times the age of Members of this House. It was but a hundred and thirtyseven years ago the Declaration of Independence was signed; not more than twice the age of Members of this House. That gold was discovered in California in 1849, and but a few decades ago men traveled from here to California by means of ox teams; that it took a hundred and eighty days to make the trip which we now make in four and a half to five days. Are you aware there has been more development in labor-saving machinery during the last 50 years than during all the ages of the past?

Our fathers used to cut their grain with a sickle. They used to thrash it with a flail. They used to build their fire by means of punk and flint; and I am told the ignition was so slow they often did not get the fires built upon which to cook their breakfasts until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. They had flintlock rifles then, and a blind man could dodge the bullets. They had no railroad trains, no Pullman palace cars, no automobiles or flying machines; they had no telegraph wires that web the sky, no telephones that reproduced the human voice. They had no submarine cables; radium and X ray were unknown. They had no mighty ships as we have now. They had no wireless contrivances, the greatest boon of all, that enables newspapers to be published on the high seas, which is nothing compared to its advantage in saving human life, for when a wreck occurs and the waves are running mountain high and the storm is beating overhead and no light is seen save the frightful lightning's flash mingled with the waves, and all is lost, a faint cry, without a messenger, is whirled out in the storm and night, as if a cry to God for help, and other ships hundreds of miles away and stations on the shore hear and heed the awful plight, and relief, swift as an eagle flies, comes sure and soon. When wireless telegraphy was invented there should have been declared a universal day of thanks.

The other night I had a dream. I saw all the seas give up their dead. I saw the bleached and withered human bones lie piled in mountain heights upon the ocean's shore. They were as numberless as the sands, as countless as the stars on high. I saw all the shipwrecks since the dawn of time; strange ancient ships were mingled midst that monster fleet. I saw the hidden rocks, the maddened sea, and heard the billows and the thunder's roar. I heard the piteous shricks, the cry to God for help, for help; but no, the storm beat on, the walling ceased, and when daylight dawned strange wreckage tossed upon the waves beneath which had sunk the dead. I woke, then slept and dreamed again. I saw Jehovah sitting high upon his throne. I saw him lean and listen. I heard Him say it shall be no more. Old ocean's wrongs and cries at last had reached his ears, and the Master of all the ships and storms and seas sent down to earth an angel clothed in white to impress the wireless device upon the minds of man, and thus was given to earth the sailors' and the seamen's friend; and I say to you, never since all the stars rejoiced above Judea's hills has so priceless a gift been made by God to the children of men. [Applause.]

This is a wonderful age. Look at our electric power and the myriads of machinery which it runs. I shall not be surprised if in a few decades annual fleets of flying machines pass from Alaska by the way of Siberia to visit all eastern lands, and I will not be amazed some day to learn that the glaciers and volcanoes of Alaska are harnessed like beasts of toil to perform services for man.

They tell us that somewhere on the shores of the Mediterranean is the birthplace of the human race. Be that as it may, since man has kept a record of events the human race has been pressing forward toward the west, guided by the setting sun. Humanity in its great march has crossed one river after another, one mountain range after another, one trackless desert after another. It has gone from one island to another, from one continent to another, until now the vanguards in this great procession of pioneers stand with lantern, ax, and pick in hand by the border of the great sea while its restless waves are beating against their more restless feet. They are dismayed. They can go no farther west. They have made the great circle, and as they watch the tide go out they know full well it will travel on and on until it beats against the land from whence they came. They watch the setting sun and know as it sinks behind the waves to them it brightens the horizon of the morning land from whence they came. Their old guiding master has sunk to rest. They can follow him no more. It is evening time, the stars are in the sky, and the northern star which shines so brightly in our western sky is full in view and it seems to beckon to the pioneer and say, "Come up. Come up to the northern land, close to where the starbeams fall, up to the great valleys and rivers, up to the sublime mountains, up to the last land, God's great reservation, the land of the midnight sun." [Applause.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, the people of Virginia, whom I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, have always held very strong convictions concerning the character and functions of the Federal Government. Some of their opinions are out of fashion now. Some of them, subjected to that test which is the final argument of kings—the fiery crucible of war—have been swept down by the march of great events and are no longer of practical application. Some, well grounded in the history and logic of the Constitution, have survived, and have to-day able and noble advocacy in every part of our common country.

Holding to these views, both by inheritance and by education, I must confess that, as a member of your Committee on the Territories, I did not at first take kindly to the proposal that the Government of the United States should construct, own, and possibly operate a railroad in the Territory of Alaska: but the hearings before your committee, and the reflections to which they gave rise, overcame my predilections on that subject and I am here to-day to announce my adherence to the principal object of this measure, and to present to you in a brief way some of the considerations which have impelled me to that conclusion.

The legal authority of Congress to enact this bill has not been questioned by its opponents; and I pause here, not for the purpose of expounding that authority, but of suggesting that the right of the Government to construct a railroad in the Territory of Alaska is not to be found in the commerce clause of the Constitution, nor in any of its provisions under which internal improvements have been heretofore undertaken in the States themselves.

Your right to undertake such work comes, however, from the fact that the Federal Government is the only Government authorized to legislate for a Territory. The right to acquire territory, either by war or by treaty; implies the right to hold and govern it when so acquired.

In addition to these sources of authority, necessarily implied from the circumstances of the case, the Constitution expressly provides that—

The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States.

Thus it follows that no State having the right to legislate for a Territory, the powers of the Federal Government within its limits are sovereign; and its inhabitants, having no power to legislate for themselves, it is not only the right, but the duty, of Congress to enact such laws as their general welfare and progress may require. Your attention is called to this legal proposition, which no man disputes, because the authority for this act should not be referred to the wrong constitutional

We admit, then, the right of the Federal Government to conduct this work. What is the duty of the people of the United States in regard thereto? The object, as you know, of this legislation is to develop the resources of this Territory. Mr. Chairman, are they worth developing? Is the game worth the candle? You gentlemen know that various views are enter-tained in regard to this country. I never saw it in my life. I will not undertake to discuss in detail questions with which other gentlemen are more familiar than myself. It used to be said that nobody could live in Alaska but a revenue officer and a polar bear. This was an exaggeration, of course.

I do not think that it is necessary for us to accept without allowance the views of that Territory which have been so well presented by the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM], nor do I think we need to take the view presented by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] on the opposite side of this question. I do not believe that the flowers of Florida will grow upon Alaskan soil, nor do I believe that the Irish potato can not be grown there.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The homestead laws in Alaska are such that a homesteader can go and sit down on 320 acres of land, and all he has to do to acquire title is to live on it for three

Mr. WATSON. Three and five.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that there are fewer people

Alaska now than there were 15 years ago?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to answer questions propounded by the gentleman from Texas; the only condition I would impose upon him is to finish his question and tell me when he is through, so that I may attempt to answer.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to get an answer to that, and then will ask another question.

Mr. WATSON. I will say that the population has not grown in Alaska in recent years; or if so, it has grown slowly. I do not remember the population 15 years ago.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that a homesteader can enter 320 acres of land and acquire title by residence?

Mr. WATSON. That is a fact.

Mr. CALLAWAY. And that they practically have not entered any homesteads in the last 15 years?

Mr. WATSON. That is a fact.

CALLAWAY. Notwithstanding the salubrious climate that has been described, better in some respects than in California or Florida.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I think all the suggestions made by the gentleman from Texas are true.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that in all parts of the United States where agriculture is possible at all all the public lands have been taken up where homesteaders can enter?

Mr. WATSON. I understand that there are 300,000,000 acres of public lands not yet taken up.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman does not understand that they are agricultural lands?

Mr. WATSON. I understand that a part of this area is in I do not know whether it ought to be settled. haps it ought never to have been discovered. [Laughter.] Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to tell the gentleman that if he has been informed that there is a foot of agricultural land in Texas open to homesteaders now, he has been misinformed.

Mr. WATSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have understood from the Texas people that there was territory enough in that State to support the population of the United States, but I do not know its quality or condition.

Mr. CALLAWAY. It is there all right, but it has all been entered and there is none open to homestead; whereas in Alaska. that splendid Territory which has been so beautifully depicted to us in which to build railroads, it is open to homestead entry and they may enter 320 acres.

Mr. WATSON. Now, if the gentleman is through with his catechism

Mr. CALLAWAY. I have another question. Some man has said that they could not get to it. Can not they get to the coast line, washed by the splendid Japan current that makes the climate just as good as the climate of California, just as well as they could if we complete a railroad to the interior at a cost of $35,000,000?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that ample provision will be made for the gentleman from Texas to present his views to the House. If he had possessed his soul in patience, he would have found out that I rose for the purpose of declining to subscribe to the extravagant claims made for Alaska; and further, to defend it from the unjust charges made against its climate, soil, and resources,

I was going to say that I believe the truth about Alaska, like the truth everywhere else, would be found somewhere about midway between the claims of the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] and the Representative from Oklahoma [Mr.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Then the gentleman does not think anybody who has spoken on this question has told the truth about it?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I always yield to gentlemen who desire to ask the any reasonable question. I do not think the gentleman from Texas ought to ask me to pass on the veracity of the gentlemen who have undertaken to discuss this question.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I wanted to get a clear statement. The gentleman said he did not think either of them had told the exact truth.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, my view about the question is that the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM], inspired, very naturally, by patriotic ardor or local predilections, has perhaps presented the natural resources of his country in a light more favorable than one not so much interested might have done. I do not question his honesty or sincerity. I simply mean that his views may have been colored by local environment; nor do I think that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris], any more than myself, who never saw Alaska, ought to enter rapidly upon mere generalizations regarding things so far from home. I may say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] I have no knowledge of Alaska but what came from the hearings of your Committee on the Territories and such literature as I have been able to secure upon the subject.

started to ask whether the resources of Alaska were worthy of development, and I want to say that after "the truth," if the gentleman so pleases, is told about Alaska, there is a plenty left of its resources worthy of the serious consideration of the people of the United States. I, for one, do not believe that Alaska will within the near future produce any considerable agricultural produce for export, nor do I believe that the suitability of Alaskan coal for naval uses has been established by the evidence. I might go a step further and say that I do not believe it has been sufficiently shown that the resources of that Territory have been within the control of the Guggenheims and the Morgans. So that my support of this bill is not based upon the belief that coal is to be found there for the use of the United States Navy; it is not based on the proposition that the agricultural resources of that country will afford any great export trade; nor is it based on the suggestion that unless the United States develops Alaska a great domain, amounting to one-fifth of the territory of the Union, is going to be turned over to Mr. Morgan or Mr. Guggenheim. I think everybody has purposed to tell the truth about Alaska, and I myself want to tell it as I conceive it to be; and after that is told enough is left, in my judgment, to amply justify the object proposed in this bill.

When agricultural experts in the employ of the Government, after years of investigation, express the conclusion that the valleys of the Tanana, the Susitna, and the Kuskokwim Rivers comprise in the neighborhood of 100,000 square miles of agricultural land, 30,000 of which is tillable, I say, Mr. Chairman, we ought to accept that statement, or, if we do not, we ought to go a little closer to Alaska than Oklahoma and Texas to find the evidence upon which to reject it. I have not the shadow of a doubt but that the soil of that interior country will support its population not only for the present but for all time to come.

I regret the circumstance, Mr. Chairman, that the naval tests have proved disappointing to gentlemen who hung their support of this bill in part upon that proposition; but of what practical value will coal be to the Navy in the years to come? We all know the fact that foreign fleets are now equipped with oilburning battleships, not coal-burning battleships. We have the statement of the Secretary of the Navy that all the ships being designed for the future will burn oil and not coal, so that this question will not long be of practical concern. If it be so to-day, it can be but a few years when it will cease to be so.

A community whose trade with the United States in the last fiscal year amounted to $70,000,000, more than that of China, of Russia, of Spain, of Austria, or of Scotland, is no mean country and ought not to be laughed out of court.

By way of recapitulation, then, in consideration of the agricultural interests, which are deemed adequate to support a large local population; in consideration of commerce, which amounts to $70,000,000 a year; in consideration of the fact that the products of that Territory during our occupancy have reached nearly $500,000,000 in value; in consideration of the fact that the Territory is known to contain at least two large mines of high-grade bituminous coal, which is valuable for every known use except high-draft pressure on battleships; in consideration of the fact that the world's supply of gold, the basis of all credit money among the nations, has remained stationary for the past five years, and that Alaska contains the largest and most promising field of gold supply on this continent, will any man be found to say that great Territory is not worthy of our regard and that its immense resources should remain undeveloped? oped?

Mr. Chairman, we ought to consider that question not with reference to ourselves alone nor with reference solely to the people of Alaska. There are but a mere handful of them there, if that will satisfy the gentleman from Texas

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN Does the gentleman from

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman spoke as if the main trade there was the fur and fish trade. Will the gentleman tell us how this railroad will help the fur and fish trade?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think the gentleman understood me

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman did not? Mr. WATSON. That was not my statement, Mr. Chairman. I can not answer for his understanding. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman stated something about how much the fish and fur trade amounted to.

Mr. WATSON. The value of those products since 1867 has aggregated over $200,000,000.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I want to know how this railroad proposi-tion would help the fish and fur trade of that country? Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, in the course of my remarks I had intended to advert to that proposition.

Mr. CALLAWAY. That is all right, if the gentleman intends to refer to that.

Mr. WATSON. In developing the country we can not develop it on the outside or on the inside or in one spot at a time; we must deal with it as a whole. I am speaking about the resources of the whole country. It may be that the fish and fur trade could be carried on by ocean vessels alone, and a railroad would be unnecessary for its conduct; but when the interior of the country is developed, there is no reason why it should not contribute to the prosperity of the seacoast, and they ought to be connected. A railroad would not be necessary to haul away the salmon nor the fur seals from Pribilof Islands, and we might transport many of the lighter products of the interior without building a railway.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They could haul the salmon into the interior.

Mr. WATSON. It could, but I am speaking of the export traffic. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas seems to attach great importance to the fact that population has developed so slowly in Alaska. I would like to call his attention to the fact that for 50 years after the Louisana purchase of 1803 the soil which now comprises the great States of Kansas, Nebraska. Colorado, Montana, and the Dakotas, located in the very heart of the continent, remained practically unsettled, with scare more population than that of Alaska to-day Nearly 40 years had passed before the fertile lands of Iowa had attracted as many as 40,000 people.

In fact, but for the lavish aid of the Government in building great railways to the Pacific much of our northwestern area would be unsettled to-day and perhaps as wild as the area would be unsettled to-day and perhaps as wild as the valleys of the Yukon.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. LOBECK. If we open up the mineral deposits in Alaska with these railroads, and even if they do not raise any grain to any great amount up there in that country, would not it open up a market for the grain that is raised in the western coast States and enable our farmers to sell a great deal of grain up States and enable our farmers to sell a great deal of grain up

Mr. WATSON. I think so. I think undoubtedly that would

Mr. LOBECK. Would not it open up a market for the farmers of the western coast States of the United States if we opened up Alaska's mineral resources?

Mr. WATSON. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. It will open up the market provided we had the population there, about which the gentleman from Texas seems to be so skeptical, not only for the agricultural products of the western coast but for the manufactured products of the eastern coast. already in Alaska, according to the best estimates which can be made, some $20,000,000 of commercial traffic which goes into the interior from the States of the Union.

With the increase of population, with the establishment of mining camps, with the development of towns there ought to be a much larger demand, particularly for the manufactured articles of the United States; and if the prophecy of the gentleman from Oklahoma should turn out to be true, that they can not raise even potatoes in that soil, the demand for breadstuffs from our western farms would constitute no mean trade. Now, gentlemen, I am in favor of this bill, in the first place because I think Alaska is worth developing. And who else thinks so? Two Presidents of the United States, Mr. Taft and Mr. Wilson, have thought so; two Secretaries of the Interior, charged with the keeping of your public domain, have thought so; your Agricultural Department thinks so; your Bureau of Mines thinks so; and the Democratic Party thinks so, if I properly interpret its platform declarations.

The only objection I know to this bill, based on principle, is that it involves Government ownership and, possibly, operation of a railroad; and I take pleasure in saying to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], to whose interesting address I listened, that I am as much opposed to Government ownership and operation of railroads in the United States as he can be.

I regard the proposition as based upon a misconception of our Government. The theory of Thomas Jefferson was that the people who were the least governed were the best governed.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman? Mr. WATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. We have gotten a long way from that in other things than the building of railroads.

Mr. WATSON. We have, sir. We have left that. Mr. BARTLETT. That is, a good many people have, and it looks like the party we belong to has

Mr. MANN. You have abandoned Jefferson entirely.
Mr. BARTLETT. I think so.
Mr. WATSON. That theory of government was that the individual ought to rely on himself. That when the Government had protected him in his life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, its legitimate functions were ended; and the citizen should then be left to work out his destiny for himself.

There is another theory, which would make the Government the parent of the citizen, have it reach out and grasp all the agencies of transportation and production, and distribute their proceeds among the people. That system of Government I would repudiate; and, at the suggestion of my friend from Georgia [Mr. Bartlett], I will say that we have traveled a long way from the first theory, and many things are now considered functions of government which 50 years ago were unheard of in the United States.

But I am opposed to the Government ownership and operation of railroads also for practical reasons. First, because it. is more costly, as demonstrated by its operation in the older countries of Europe. Second, because of the fact—
Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You mean Government operation of railroads?

Mr. WATSON. I mean Government ownership and operation. which in Europe generally go together. I am opposed to it because of the fact that it creates an "aristocracy of labor." a privileged class of Government employees, paid higher wages and working shorter hours than their fellow citizens working in other fields, whose wages would have to come out of the taxes of the people, and whose especial privileges would be out of harmony with the equality of free institutions. So vast an army of favored employees, conducting great public works, would by organization secure legislation which would be detrimental to society and in the end corrupt our political system.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that the different organizations of this country to-day control this House now and get such legislation as they demand?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, obviously I can not answer that question.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman? Mr. WATSON. Yes, sir. Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact, also, as demonstrated by Government ownership of railroads in Europe, that not only is it more costly to the people, but that the roads are less efficiently run and operated?

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the gentleman that the accommodations for the public are not equal to those supplied in the United States, where private ownership prevails.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that the accommodations on the public-owned railroads in Germany are just as good as on the privately owned railroads in England?

Mr. WATSON. I can not answer that from personal knowledge. My travels and observation have not gone that far from But statistics show that the cost of operation and rates in Germany and Belgium and other countries where public ownership prevails are higher than in the United States; and travelers say that the accommodations afforded them are not equal to those of their own country.

Another objection to public ownership is that it places the Government in competition with the private enterprises and employments of its own citizens, thereby stifling their initiative and industry, and in the end undermining their independence.

It seems to me the proper rule is that where the individual can do a thing as well as the Government it ought to be left to him under such regulation as public safety may require, but where the thing to be done is essential to the public welfare but beyond the ability of the individual safely or efficiently to perform, then the Government, if it have the constitutional power, should do it.

Applying these principles to the situation in Alaska, we find that here is a great Territory of boundless area and great wealth lying dormant on our hands for half a century, and lacking only transportation to make it available to the uses of mankind; that this need, however, is beyond the strength of private capital to supply, on account of local conditions and natural obstacles; that there is little or no private business with which the Government would compete, no property to confiscate, nor private enterprises to destroy; no long-vested institutions, social, economic, or political, to alter or subvert; and, lastly, that here in a new part of the world we find demanded at the hands of civilization a great work attainable only by the united resources of a great Nation.

No pioneer people similarly situated were ever yet able, save through the tedious toil of centuries to provide facilities for the development of their country. In this day of progress and science why should we impose such a task upon our fellow citizens in Alaska?

Is it because the relief proposed would be an "entering wedge" for public ownership of railroads in the United States?

After the construction of this road the bill does authorize the President, in one contingency, to operate it on Government account; but the bill contains a strong declaration of preferthe part of Congress against Government operation; and it is to be so operated only in the event of the failure to lease the same upon reasonable terms. Even should the burden of operation be, for a time, cast upon the Government by the unsettled state of affairs, it is earnestly wished and sin-cerely believed that the local development will soon reach a stage where the burden can be safely shifted to private hands for operation and ultimately for ownership.

Will this qualified example of Government ownership and possible operation in a very exceptional case prove an "entering wedge" long enough to be driven into the United States?

I hope not.

Mr. Chairman, Alaska is a thousand miles from the nearest State in the Union; a foreign land and a great ocean separate it from us. The building and leasing of a railroad, and possiit from us. The building and leasing of a railroad, and possi-bly its temporary operation, in that remote and almost unset-tled country would have but little, if any, more effect upon our domestic policy than a practical experiment conducted in any other part of the world. Certainly we have not lacked for ex-amples on this subject. For a generation half the countries of Europe have furnished manifold examples of public ownership, and in most instances these have served as warnings rather than guides to be followed.

And if it be the "first step" that gentlemen fear to take, I would remind them that the Government took that first step some 10 years ago, when it bought the railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, and it took several other steps when it proceeded, as it has done, to operate the same and, in connection therewith, a line of steamships from Colon to New York. But this example has, I believe, in no way affected our general policy respecting our domestic railroads.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill does involve as one element the ownership and possibly the operation of a Government railroad; and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] pertinently said that unless it could be shown that this case is an exception to the general rule it ought not to prevail, and to that I subscribe. Alaska is an exceptional case in every essential respect, as I have tried to demonstrate.

The reason why I am willing to admit Government ownership temporarily in Alaska is the fact, gentlemen, that I do not believe | railroads in Alaska.

the question before this House is whether the United States Government or the Guggenheims should own Alaska. I do not believe that the question is whether there shall be public ownership or private ownership in Alaska. But the question, as I understand it, is whether there shall be Government ownership in Alaska or no ownership and no railroad. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, there are some things that private capital can not do. It could not build the Panama Canal. De Lesseps was a man of genius. He had the resources of the French nation behind him to a large extent, and yet he could not build the Panama Canal. Private enterprise is not able to keep intact the levees of the Mississippi River. The great Father of Waters can not be harnessed by private capital and controlled by private means. Does any man say the Panama Canal ought not to have been built because the Government had to build it? Is there any gentleman here from the banks of the Mississippi who thinks that the levee system ought to be abandoned because private capital could not alone maintain it?

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman? Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Panama Canal was built for governmental purposes, chiefly in order that we might have a nearer route from this part of our country to the western part of the country, rather than to go around the Horn.

Mr. WATSON. I think that is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. And, therefore, it was for governmental purposes purely.

Mr. WATSON. I understand it was for governmental purposes, but if the gentleman had followed my remarks be would have seen I was not discussing this from the standpoint of legal authority.

I was saying that there were some things in this world that ought to be done which private capital could not do, and that the Panama Canal was one of them, no matter what the specific reason for the undertaking might be.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me one other word?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. In reference to the control of the Mississippi River, the Government alone has the right to control the Mississippi, and it is a matter for interstate commerce, and nobody else can interfere except by permission of the Govern-

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, the question whether anybody could or could not interfere is a legal proposition. As a financial and physical proposition nobody would be able to undertake work of that magnitude.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.
Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman say that if the French promoters of the Panama Canal had had Goethals and Gorgas, and their intelligence and genius, they could not have built the Panama Canal?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has asked me an engineering question which I am unable to answer. All that can say is that they did not do it. And I want to say to this House that, in my humble judgment, if the Government of the United States does not construct this railroad into the interior of Alaska it will not be constructed, not because the Guggen-

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WATSON. In a moment. Not because the Morgans or the Guggenheims have preempted the field, but because the great Creator has placed in Alaska physical obstacles which are be-yond the reach of private capital or any probable combination of private capital to surmount. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. SAUNDERS. I gather from what the gentleman says that the difficulty in the construction of the Panama Canal by private capital was that the amount of money required for its construction was so great that private capital could not compass it.

Mr. WATSON. That is one of the reasons; yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. And the suggestion is that the expenditures that we are asked to make in Alaska for these railroads are so great that private capital can not compass them?

Mr. WATSON. That is one of the reasons; yes. Still another reason is, I will say to the gentleman, not only can not so large an amount of private capital be got together easily, but because private capital requires quick returns on its investment, which would not have been forthcoming with respect to the Panama Canal, and in my judgment will not be forthcoming from Mr. SAUNDERS. Will my colleague answer me another question after that question?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. As a member of the committee can you give us any estimate of the probable amount of money that will be ultimately required for the construction of railroads in Alaska? I gather from what the gentleman says that this is only a preliminary or entering wedge of $35,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is a great gatherer [laughter], and he is gathering a great deal more than he ought to from the few things I have said. The committee took no testimony which I can recall as to the total amount of railroad mileage which would be necessary to develop all parts of the great Territory of Alaska. The proposition before this House is a specific one. It is to construct a railroad or railroads which shall connect the southern seacoast of Alaska with the navigable waters of the interior. If the gentleman will consult his geography, he will find that nature has put a barrier to the number of these railroads; it seems possible for only two roads to cross the mountains, and possibly one may satisfy all the purposes involved.

Amendments to the bill prepared by the committee will provide a limitation upon the mileage to be constructed and fix the amount to be expended at a maximum of $35,000,000. The report of the commission sent to Alaska contemplates the utilization of the two railway lines already in existence, and thus two distinct connections with the interior of the Territory, comprising an aggregate construction of 733 miles of road. It is hoped and believed, however, by the friends of this measure that it may be found expedient and practicable to accomplish all the ends in view by the building of a single line to the interior, with a short road to one of the coal fields, at a total mileage not exceeding 500.

At first thought, $35,000,000 may seem a large sum. But when we remember it is to be paid back from the proceeds of the road and from the sale of public lands in Alaska, the possibility of any loss to the Government is very remote. The revenue from the coal lands alone, when once open to development, will speedily extinguish the debt. Considering the resources of the Government and the great benefits to be obtained, no man ought to think the amount called for unreasonable.

This much in value, and many times more, did we contribute in railroad building in the States of the South and West; more than this we now appropriate each year to the improvement of rivers and harbors. But recently a single city of the United States expended over $300,000,000 in subways for its citizens. Canada is at this time financing a trunk line across the continent to cost over $200,000,000. England is pushing great transportation lines through Africa from Egypt to Cape Town.

Are we alone then, among great nations, to withhold from our own people and upon our own soil a great public improvement because a few million dollars stand in the way?

But, Mr. Chairman, the settlement and development of Alaska has a broader and higher meaning than any which may be drawn from the value of its commerce or from the influence of its industrial methods.

Hitherto in modern times the destinies of the world have been decided on the shores of the Mediterranean and the Atlantic; and it was to the revolutions of Europe and America that diplomats and statesmen have looked to determine the fate of governmental systems and of nations.

The Panama Canal has opened the way which Columbus sought to the east. The eyes of the world are now turned to the Pacific; in its bosom are held the secrets of the future. On its opposite shores two great segments of the human family, separated ages ago and differentiated now by countless vicissitudes of fortune, confront each other. Differing in language, in religion, in race, after the lapse of many centuries the Caucasian and the Mongolian, the Old World and the New, are met face to face.

That the greeting may be cordial and their rivalry confined to the friendly competition of trade is the patriot's devout wish. Yet is man ever driven onward by his own elemental wants—the unceasing struggle for bread, the longing for adventure and for gain, the greed for land and the space in which to pursue life, liberty, and happiness. The teeming millions of Asia, suddenly awake from the long lethargy of the past, conscious of their strength and inspired with zeal for a new and larger life, press for an outlet from the low wages and narrow confines of their native home. In the end they must find it somewhere. Where?

Within sight lie the comparatively helpless islands of the late Spanish archipelago, now a dependency of our own. Across the sea, to the north and east, stretch 2,000 miles of American coast line, for the most part unsettled and undefended. Already have the doors of the mainland had to be closed to their everincreasing numbers, attracted hither by the higher wages and freer atmosphere of the great Republic freer atmosphere of the great Republic.

This is one of the problems confronting us on the Pacific; and it is problems like this which invest Alaska with an interest of far more value than the coal of Matanuska or the gold of Treadwell.

The civilizations of different hemispheres can not be brought into long contact upon terms of equality. They will react upon one another with detriment to both until in the end nature's law asserts itself—when the weaker will perish and the fitter survive.

And if the fate of Caucasian civilization is to be worked, as we believe, in large part upon American soil, let us not delay to lay the foundations of a great white commonwealth against our gateway in the north. Let us plant there the civil liberty of the American, the language of Shakespeare, and the religion of Jesus Christ. [Applause.]

of Jesus Christ. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. White] is recognized.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, a number of my colleagues, knowing that I had spent two years in the Territory of Alaska, have asked me to state my views on the pending legislation and my reasons for opposing the expenditure of thirty-slx millions of the people's money for the construction of a standard-gauge railroad from tidewater to the interior.

The United States purchased Alaska from Russia in 1867 for $7,200,000, and 30 years later the American people seemed to realize for the first time the great mineral wealth contained in this vast area of 680,000 square miles. The news of a rich placer strike reached Seattle about August, 1807. The chamber of commerce of that city, with a fine appreciation of the advantage to be gained in exchanging the goods of her merchants for the gold seekers' cash, promptly gave the widest publicity to the somewhat exaggerated tales of fortunes to be quickly and easily made. The size of the nuggets increased as the report traveled, so that by the time the story reached the East the gold of Alaska could be found in large chunks, provided, of course, a man had the time to make the trip and was equipped with an outfit purchased in Seattle.

The attractive book on Alaska and her resources presented to Members of Congress, written by a man who was sent to the Territory at the expense of the Seattle Board of Trade, the lecturer who is at this time creating the proper atmosphere in Washington with his illuminated stereopticon views, and the moving pictures to which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] referred last week, reminds me of the continued activity and enterprise of Seattle's business organization.

When the boats landed us, with our outfits, on the beach at the head of Lynn Canal in February, 1898, there was not a mile of wagon or rail road in Alaska, and 6,000 of us packed our outfits—800 pounds to the man—over the Chilkoot or White Pass, carrying 50 pounds each trip. Three years later I traveled the distance on the White Pass & Yukon Railroad.

I have read the hearings before the House and Senate Committees on Territories and have listened to the debate, and have been unable to find sufficient proof of resources or population in Alaska to justify an affirmative vote for the bill under consideration.

The Delegate from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham], in a six-hour speech, gave an exhaustive description of the resources which in his opinion justify the expenditure of the public funds in the construction of the railroad, and I wish to congratulate him on his persuasive argument in behalf of congressional authorization for the expenditure of $36,000,000 in the district he represents.

The statements that seem to me to most exaggerate the future possibilities of production in the Territory come from Members who have never been near Alaska; the minority report, on the other hand, has not given the land credit for the resources she possesses, and has, I think, pictured the climate worse than it is. I am conceding that Alaska is a wonderful country, and has, since its purchase by the United States, added approximately $446,000,000 to the sum total of the world's wealth; but is not the burden of proof on the proponents of this legislation to show that conditions at this time or in the near future justify the expenditure of $36,000,000 of the public's funds in the construction of a railroad into the interior?

The President, in his message to Congress submitted December 2, 1913, says:

Alaska as a storehouse should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of railways.

Every man familiar with conditions in Alaska knows that the free development of her resources has been very greatly retarded since the withdrawal of the Government lands in 1906; but as Members of Congress, responsible to the people for expenditures, we should fully satisfy ourselves that it is necessary to purchase a thirty-six-million-dollar key to open that particular storehouse.

Let us examine for a minute into the kind of economic wealth that has been developed in the past: The fisheries of Alaska have produced $148,000,000 of the total $446,000,000. The corporations send their ships up from San Francisco, carrying a great number of Chinese and Japanese to do the work; they bring the tin cans and the machinery with them, and when the season closes the entire product is shipped, and crews and workmen all disappear until the following year, and Alaska has been benefited only by the small amount paid in wages to some of the natives on the islands or at the mouths of the What possible bearing has this great industry on the need of a railroad into the interior?

Alaska has contributed to the world's wealth $73,000,000 in fur, almost wholly from the fur seals of the Pribilof Islands. There is manifestly no argument in favor of the building of a railroad by the Government in the fish and fur production, aggregating $221,000,000, nor is there anything in the figures to develop the Territory and make it a great empire, Deducting the value of Alaska's fish and furs, we have remaining $215,000,000 received from Alaska in gold, silver, and copper. The silver and copper and a large percentage of the gold is produced on the southeastern coast of Alaska and adjacent islands along the coast. Of the total gold production of 1913 of $15,000,000, it is estimated that $7,000,000 was the output from the interior of Alaska, and that amount represented practically the production of the great Yukon Valley and its many tributaries, embracing approximately 75 per cent of Alaska's 590,000 square miles of area.

I wish to call the attention of Members of the House who are not familiar, except from the standpoint of some unprofitable investment, with mining operations to the two processes of mining used in the production of gold. Quartz mining involves heavy machinery to crush the gold-bearing quartz rock, and to profitably operate a quartz mine you must have transportation facilities either in the form of water or rail. The other process is placer mining, and a rich placer is a poor man's dream, because he needs no capital except good health, an optimistic temperament, and strength and endurance in handling a pick and shovel. The interior of Alaska is a poor man's country in that it is a great placer-mining camp. The Yukon Valley, including its tributaries, has produced and will produce the richest placer camps in the world. Nature has covered up the pay streaks, with the single exception of the beach at Nome, with from 10 to 60 feet of frozen ground, as we Klondikers discovered upon reaching the promised land. In place of finding nuggets in the grass roots, we found them after thawing and digging 8 to 10 inches a day through 60 feet of frozen dirt and muck. From the very character of placer operations you will at once realize why there are no placer miners strenuously urging the passage of this bill, either in person or by petition.

The mighty Yukon and its tributaries, and the White Pass & Yukon Railroad connecting the river at the head of navigation with Skagway on the coast, furnish adequate transportation facilities for the ten or twelve thousand placer miners who constitute the population of the interior. Many mining engineers have contended for a number of years that there must be valuable quartz ledges in a country so rich in placer gold, but so far the quartz mines have been located only along the coast and on the islands, and efforts to develop a paying proposition in the interior have been unsuccessful.

I have tried to show, Mr. Chairman, that in the total production of the $446,000,000 there is nothing to warrant the authorization by Congress of the appropriation or bond issue for the construction of the railroad in the interior, but Members urging favorable consideration of this bill are delightfully optimistic and persuasive in their statements and tables of tonnage resulting from the development of agriculture and cattle raising, foilowing the construction of the railroad. There was some tes-timony in the committee hearings touching the development of quartz mining in the vicinity of Fairbanks, and strangely enough the one or two small mines referred to were in the Tanana Valley. As to future development we are asked to be satisfied with prophecy born of day dreams.

The manifest difficulty in arguing against this Alaska railroad building proposition is presented when Members honestly make statements with regard to the tonnage to be developed in Alaska without furnishing trustworthy data, or at least any figures that are not contradicted by the very authorities they quote. Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I will. Mr. OGLESBY. I asked purely for information, and because I want to ask some one who knows. We took a good deal of testimony, and I have read a good deal taken before the Senate committee, to the effect that a number of quartz mines near Fairbanks have been opened and tested and that gold had been found in considerable quantities, and that the quartz mines could be worked which produce gold and run very much higher in percentage to the ton than the mines of this country, but that the trouble was that the high cost of transportation made it unprofitable; that if better transportation facilities could be had so that the mines could be worked it would turn a losing proposition into a profitable enterprise. I would like to know whether the gentleman concurs in that idea or whether he has had sufficient experience there since the quartz mines have been opened up;

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman mean on the southern coast or in the interior?

Mr. OGLESBY. I understand they are in the interior, in the vicinity of Fairbanks, and in other sections of the country.

Mr. WHITE. I will say that I am not familiar with the particular mines to which the gentleman has referred. The point I am endeavoring to make clear is that we have not been furnished with any authentic figures to show that quartz ledges have been developed which would justify us in authorizing the expenditure of $36,000,000 for a railroad into the interior. have had assertions and statements with regard to the future development which, in my opinion, can be explained only by a natural enthusiasm for an unknown and undeveloped country. I can assure the gentleman of my personal acquaintance with a tendency of the average man to enlarge on the possibilities of wealth growing out of quartz ledges, and that I have smoked the same Alaskan tobacco used by some of the witnesses appearing before the committees. The gentleman asks about the quartz mines which could be worked if better and cheaper transportation facilities could be furnished. Does the gentleman realize that our rich and prosperous country could hardly finance a scheme to reach all the low-grade ores in the Western States, not to mention Alaska? If the advocates of this bill believe Congress should mortgage the future revenues of the people to go into the business of operating coal lands or gold-bearing quartz which individuals and corporations have found through years of practical experience can be operated only at a loss, then I am fearful for the future of the country's finances

The reason the average mining proposition does not pay dividends is because it costs $1.25 to produce a dollar's worth of gold, and as'soon as the stockholders cease contributing the difference the mines close and operations are not resumed until a fresh class of tenderfeet are persuaded to invest in the stock. It appears to me that this bill inaugurates the policy of mortgaging the revenues of 95,000,000 people to experiment in the resources of Alaska. If the railroad is built and its operation does not prove too great a drain on the Treasury of the United States, there will undoubtedly be an urgent demand from owners of low-grade ore mines in the Western States for a Government railroad to their property.

When the gentleman asks if the construction of this railroad at Government expense would not turn a losing proposition into a profitable enterprise I am forced to answer in the affirmative, but must decline to go on record in favor of such a governmental

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that $74,000,000 in gold have been taken out of the mines near Fairbanks.

Mr. WHITE. Quartz mines?

Mr. HOUSTON. No.

Mr. WHITE. I am talking about quartz mines. I made the statement a little while ago that it only took a pick and a shovel and a man's strength to get the gold out of the placer mines.

Mr. HOUSTON. I asked if it was not a fact that $74,000,000 of placer gold had been taken out of the mines near Fairbanks. Mr. WHITE. I admit that, but you do not need a railroad to transport that gold. You can take all the gold out of that country without a railroad. We brought our gold out of the Klondike on a boat to White Horse Rapids and from there to Skagway by train. Over fifty millions came out by that route in two years. It does not take much packing to transport gold. The point I am trying to make is that the returns from the interior of Alaska are from the placer gold of the country.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I will.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman states that it does not take much transportation to get gold out of the country. That is very likely because gold is in a small compass; but the gentleman ought to admit that, in respect to transportation, getting provisions in upon which the people who take the gold out live does take considerable transportation. Mr. Brooks says that it takes 50 per cent of the total output in the Fairbanks country to pay the freight bills. We took out $75,000,000, and so it took thirty-seven and a half millions to pay the freight within the last 10 years.

Mr. WHITE. I will say to the gentleman that I have said the fertility of the soil was great enough to support the population necessitated by the mining interests. I am not disputing that fact. I am simply stating that as a Member of this House from Ohio, representing 225,000 people, I refuse to mortgage the future to the extent of thirty-five or forty million dollars to go into and develop the Tanana Valley without their showing me-and I wonder what the Missouri Members will do-showing me what tonnage can be developed to justify the expenditure of

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Does the gentleman know that there have been large quartz veins opened in the last year, and that the output last year was more than $400,000; that there are unlimited areas of quartz there that it is impossible to work under the present transportation methods, but if we had cheap rates we would have large quartz mines in that vicinity? Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. WHITE. I know something of it, and I know there has been some quartz gold produced there, but I am also somewhat familiar with the optimism developed in the average mining prospectus.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is not a prospectus of an average mining district.

The gentleman says $400,000 were taken out? Mr. WHITE.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is the report.

Mr. WHITE. Does that warrant this Congress appropriating thirty-five or forty million dollars to build a railroad into Alaska? I put that question even to the gentleman from Alaska. I will say to the gentleman that I have kept up my acquaintance with a few men whom I knew when in Alaska and who have continued their mining operations, and I meet them from time to time. I asked one man two years ago how things were getting along. He said, "White, Alaska is in great shape now. If you don't make a thing go and lose your money, you cuss the Government, cuss the Guggenheims and the Morgans, and support WICKER-SHAM for Delegate." That is a fine situation to be in for the gentleman from Alaska—on election day, at least.

But I am maintaining that we are asked to appropriate this vast sum of money at a time when we are approaching the danger line in way of appropriations in general-in the development of a scheme which, as business men, I can say without fear of contradiction, if it were presented to us in a business office and we were asked to furnish the capital stock-and that is what the Government does-we would not pay 25 cents on the dollar for the stock or bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE,

Mr. WINTE. Certainly. Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would the gentleman be willing, in lieu of this appropriation of money, to do as was done in the case of the Northern Pacific Railroad—furnish every other section of land for 40 miles each side of the right of way the whole distance?

Mr. WHITE. I would not. Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then, if we can not have and do not want such a plan as that, and we all admit that that plan, as bad as it was, developed the West-

Yes. Mr. WHITE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why is not the alternative then the building of a railroad with Government money?

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman asked me a question, and I answered him and said that I would not do as he suggested, but I have already said that the illustration of putting the railroad through the West is not applicable. The climatic condition and the condition of the ground enters into the consideration of the question, and I claim that you can not parallel the cases.

The railroads of the West were constructed over level country for the greater part of the distance west of the Mississippi, and the early settlers could haul their produce or drive their cattle to the railroads before the day of road building, but in Alaska your pioneer must have a road built or himself make one if his property is a quarter of a mile or over from your Government railroad. In other words, you meet entirely dif-ferent physical conditions in Alaska. Let me read you a part of the report of the United States Road Commissioners for Alaska for 1913, and in giving their opinion notice how guarded, for obvious reasons, the language is:

Our board specifically disavows any intent to set forth views in op-position or discouragement to railroad construction in the Territory under proper limitations, but after several years of careful observation and study of the land transportation conditions and of the natural inducements to development and to settlement which exist, is convinced that no rapid or general development will follow the construction of trunk lines of railroad to the interior unless preceded or accompanied by the construction of numerous wagon roads and trails as feeders, and even then the development will be slow.

In making this statement our board may incur the suspicion of wishing to give undue importance to its own work, but the railroad commission itself recognized this fact, and no one acquainted with the true situation can fail to do likewise.

Unlike the great West in another respect, Alaska has a wonderful system of waterways, both coastal and interior, and while the interior system is open only about five months of the year, during this open period supplies can be distributed to almost every part of the Territory by means of its various ramifications.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does it not get just as cold in

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does it not get just as cold in Montana as it does in Alaska?

Mr. WHITE. Yes; but the ground is not frozen for 50 feet through in Montana and does not stay frozen the year around. Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any more of my time. How much of my time remains? The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has yet five minutes remaining.

Mr. WHITE. I can not yield any more of my time. There have been long speeches delivered, Mr. Chairman, upon the agricultural future of Alaska, and by one side we have been shown the picture of a frozen area of arctic cold, suitable only to the habits of the polar bear and the Eskimo, while the other pic-ture has been painted in the color scheme of a tropical climate and fertile soil. During my experience in Alaska I did not see a polar bear nor an Eskimo, nor do I remember seeing any royal palms or orange groves in any of my travels. Yukon strawberries, it is true, 12 months in the year, but, let me explain, we applied the name of that delicious fruit to a dish of plain beans. A man can live in Alaska during the winter, though the temperature drops uncomfortably low at times, but when one is busy working in profitable pay dirt one does not stop to complain of the extreme cold or the 18 hours of night.

But is the climate and present condition of the soil suitable to agriculture and a growing population? I confess my inability to picture the honest farmer reaching north of the sixtieth degree of latitude to find land to till. One of the most important problems involved in the high cost of living at the present time is the movement from the farms to the city, and if, as is true, the number of deserted farms is increasing from year to year in New England and Ohio, what can be the basis for the statements we have heard to the effect that those farmers will follow the building of a railroad into the Tanana

Valley?

It is estimated that we have more than 300,000,000 acres of public land in the United States waiting for the homesteader to go on it with his family, turn over the soil, build a house, You can buy good farm land near a railand begin farming. road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois for $100 an acre. then, go to Alaska, where the ground is frozen 100 feet deep, where the temperature goes down to 65° below zero, and take up land which the testimony shows costs $200 an acre to clear, and will possibly yield a crop every second year?

The supporters of this legislation have presented elaborate figures to show that other territories in the same latitude support millions of population. Canada, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark have been cited as illustrations. I beg to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the land in Canada attracting a population at this time is two or three hundred miles south of that degree of latitude bounding the southern part of the interior area of Alaska, and that in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden the Gulf Stream tempers the climate and makes possible agricultural development.

In some of the arguments in support of the bill we find Members diverting the Japan Stream so as to carry its beneficent effect to the interior of Alaska, and one Member referred to it as flowing up the Yukon. As a matter of fact, the Japan Stream comes from the south, crosses east at the Aleutian Islands, one branch flowing along the southern coast and tempering the climate during the winter months. As the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] has correctly stated, the warm-air currents coming from the Pacific and influenced by the Japan Stream strike the mountain ranges on the southern coast of Alaska and the moisture is precipitated in snow and rain-40 to 50 feet of snow and an excessive rainfall. The Japan Stream therefore has no appreciable effect on the climate of the interior.

I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the agriculture of Alaska can ever justify the expenditure on the part of the Government of $35,000,000 in the form of a railroad.

There are mysteries connected with the natural conditions in the Territory which have never yet been solved. The ground, not excepting the region in the Tanana Valley, is frozen to bed-rock, in some places to 40 feet and in others to from 200 to 300 feet deep, the whole substance of earth between the surface and bedrock being glacial in character. In the next claim to the one in which I was working there was found at a depth of 25 feet a part of a mammoth's tusk solidly embedded in the frozen gravel. These subterranean ice fields could not have been formed under present climatic conditions.

The supporters of this bill say there are records of as low temperatures in Canada and New England as in the interior of Alaska, and the statement is undoubtedly true, but let me call to their attention the important fact that the ground in Canada, New England, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway is not frozen to a depth of 100 feet, and their agricultural areas are not underlaid with a glacial formation.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] has quoted very extensively from agricultural bulletins to show that the interior of Alaska is not suitable to an extensive development of agriculture, and I will not take the time of the House to repeat what he has so ably presented; however, I would like to quote Prof. Georgeson, who has been both criticized and praised in the discussion of this bill, and who was superintendent of the experimental station in Alaska. He tells us that they have been unable to find a wheat that will ripen there; they have found a rye, which is the earliest ripening of the grains, from which they have some very good samples; they have found an oat which they have ripened there, but in his report he advocates the policy of not attempting to ripen even those grains, but to cut them for hay purposes on account of the lack of forage. In his report for 1910, speaking of the Tanana Valley, Prof. Georgeson says:

Georgeson says:

Alaska soils are not rich. Frequently statements from travelers and other observers are seen to the effect that the soil must be exceedingly rich in plant food to judge from the height of the grasses and the luxuriance of some of the vegetation, but such a conclusion is not warranted. Grasses will sometimes grow rank on an almost barren gravelly soil, because they have plenty of moisture and they are adapted to the climate and to the conditions. The virgin soil in the interior is everywhere frozen to an unknown depth or to bedrock. In this state of refrigeration there can be no activity of the organisms which aid in the formation of mold and the manufacture of plant food from the organic matter, and what plant food the soil may hold is in a large degree insoluble, and therefore not available for plants except by a long and slow process of weathering. For this reason the soil soon becomes exhausted and fertilizers are necessary. This is particularly demonstrated by the results at the Fairbanks station the past season, which will be referred to later.

Now, the problem is how to render the soil fertile. Stock breeding in the interior will almost certainly be limited to the few animals on each farm necessary for domestic use. The feeding period is too long to make it practicable to maintain a herd of cattle on even a moderate scale. It will be a difficult matter to provide the feed. For this reason stable manure will never be abundant in that country. Therefore some other source of plant food must be sought, and it is hoped that this source may be some species of legume which is hardy enough to withstand the winters, which will yield fair crops of forage, and which at the same time has the property of enriching the soil with nitrogen, as do the clovers and alfalfas in more southerly latitudes.

I think that is a fair statement of the soil conditions in

I think that is a fair statement of the soil conditions in Alaska. It stands to reason that with such subterranean conditions there can not be the development which he says is so desirable and which the advocates of this bill promise upon the completion of the railroad. It is true that when the tundra, or Alaskan grass, is removed—and it must be removed at great expense—and the sun, which shines during the hundred days of summer for 23 hours a day, gets to the soil it does thaw the surface down to a depth of 3 or 4 feet. The soil, when the surface down to a depen of the thrown up into ridges so that it may be drained, raises a certain class of products—chiefly those that require a great deal of water and not much richness of soil. My estimate of the agricultural possibilities of Alaska is that they are sufficient to satisfy the needs of the placer-mining population of the interior, and that is all. And it occurs to me that the railroad might so lower the price of the products as to render unprofitable any farming in the interior.

In opposing this bill I am not unmindful of the deplorable condition of Alaska's resources at the present time; it is certainly a bottled-up Alaska when men are burning wood at $20 a cord with coal in their back yards; but I believe her coal can be released without the Government expending the vast amount of money proposed in this bill.

The Secretary of the Interior has suggested in his last report a plan by which the grasping corporations can be restrained from appropriating the people's wealth as represented in the coal fields. Secretary Lane has suggested a lease system, and I was very agreeably surprised to hear the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] a few minutes past, coming from the West, as he does, speak in favor of the lease system. As an oil man I am familiar with that system, and for the first time in the business came into contact with the Government as the agent of the Indians in the Oklahoma oil fields, and the Interior Department has been successful in preventing monopolistic control of the Oklahoma oil fields through this system.

I believe the United States Government can regulate whatever production of wealth may be found in Alaska through the lease system. There is coal in the Matanuska and Bering Sea fields, although it is rather unfortunate in the light of all the optimistic predictions made by the proponents of the bill that the report of the Navy test recently made was disappointing. But I believe there is coal and that it has been demonstrated beyond the question of a doubt, and further believe that should this bill fail to pass railroads will be built by private capital.

I am not afraid of this proposition from the standpoint of Government ownership, and if you can prove to me that that is the only solution of the problem I will be willing to vote for the railroad to the coal fields, which will involve some $9,000,000. We can see that there is tonnage in coal, and to transport requires a railroad.

The Alaska Northern can be extended and the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to control railroad rates. Are we to say at this time, with a Democratic President who has already demonstrated his courage and great ability in restoring the rule of the people, that we will throw up our hands and give up trying to solve the question of the control of cor-porations in this country, and that the only solution of the problem is Government ownership of railroads? I do not be-lieve we are willing to admit that. I do not believe that the necessity exists for us to absolutely give up the solution of the problem of what to do with the Government land, except to enter into the building of Government-owned railroads.

I do not blame our Progressive friends for voting for this bill, because it is in their platform, but I can not see any obligation for a Democrat voting for it other than the words in the message of the President. Although I dislike to differ with the administration, I am unwilling to give up my fixed opinion with regard to the unwisdom of building the railroad. The wisest and most patriotic of men are sometimes mistaken, and I fear the President will regret his advocacy of this proposition.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I will.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman has referred several times to his long experience in Alaska. I would like to ask him in what part of Alaska he was?

I was in the Klondike, and said so.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. In Dawson?

Mr. WHITE. In Dawson City. Mr. WICKERSHAM. In the Yukon territory?

Mr. WHITE. I only made one trip; yes; the Yukon territory, 40 miles from the Alaskan boundary line.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. About 300 miles from the Tanana Valley; and that is the nearest the gentleman was to it? Mr. WHITE. No; I went down the river to Rampart.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. But never was in the Tanana?

Mr. WHITE. Never was in the Tanana Valley.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. And never was in the coal-mining us, and my statements are based on his reports.

In conclusion I wish to state that my conviction is there have been a great many exaggerated statements made in regard to I might very naturally be expected to favor legislation looking toward the future benefit of Alaska, because I got my start there, but I am a Member of Congress and voting the people's money raised by taxation, or that will be raised, and I look at this as I believe all other Members of Congress should consider the proposition—as if we were investing our own money. I do not propose to spend the money collected through Federal taxes from the people of my district and from every other district in the country for a railroad-building proposition in which I, as an individual, would not put, as I have said, 25 cents on the dollar of my own money. I appreciate that we can not estimate the functions of government exactly as we would an ordinary investment, but when you go into Government ownership of railroads you very nearly approach a governmental function, which should be estimated on the basis of dollars and

I believe Alaska has a bright future and that her problems will be solved without the Government building a railroad so soon as we have courage enough in Congress to face the situation and pass the proper legislation.

I presume there is no use to oppose this bill, as with the administration behind the measure it will have a large majority; but I am convinced that some of the affirmative votes will be cast by those who are radically opposed to Government ownership of railroads in the belief that this one experiment in Alaska will cure the country for all time of the desire to go very far in Government ownership of railroads.

In my opinion the people will be taxed to keep up the operating expenses of this road after it is built, and if a Rockefeller or a Morgan were to build the road and pay for the construction I doubt very much whether I would even under such favorable conditions vote to accept the gift if they were to offer it to the Government. If there are any resources in Alaska to warrant such a tax, then let us build the railroad; but if, as I honestly believe, the advocates of this bill have failed to satisfy us as to any definite tonnage, we ought to think very carefully before appropriating the people's money for such a project. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am glad indeed to follow the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE], who has been out in Alaska. I live in the northwest corner of the United States, which is just as far as you can get to the nearest point of Alaska, but which is nearly 1,000 miles away from where he states he grubstaked a man to try some venture. And yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] while he was in Alaska was as far away from where we want to build this railroad as my home is from the nearest point of that great Territory. So much for an intimate knowledge of the country by any of us. One might as well boat down the Ohio River and then say that he knows all about Colorado. I am glad to note, however, that the gentleman pre-tends to no general knowledge of Alaska nor of its present conditions.

I beg to say that I am a member of the Committee on the Territories and have given just as much study as possible to this problem, and I have based my own conclusions in behalf of Alaska railroad building on what happened to the country in the United States west of the Missouri River and north of Oklahoma when this Government gave, in 1862 and 1864, the great land grants which my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, called a hideous, ghastly, blighting precedent against the building of Government railroads. He said it was a blot on the Nation's history; but I will go further than that, gentlemen, and say it is still a blot on the Nation's history, for there still exists the lieu-land system by which we are being "horse traded" out of the very best lands in the forest reserves and elsewhere, which our people fondly think are being held for them. However, I will not go into that at this time.

But west of the Missouri River and north of Oklahoma 5,300 miles of railroad were built under enormous land grants, and out West we now have 58,000 miles of well-built railroads, and many large cities in every western State, and a prosperous and growing country that is the warehouse of this Nation.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will, gladly. Mr. HARDY. Would that 5,300 miles of road have been built unless the Government had either built it itself or given the land to these private parties?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Government had to do either one thing or the other, if it intended that the country should become populated, and the same thing applies to Alaska right now. I will come to that, and if you will listen just a moment I am going to tell you what happened in the effort to build a transcontinental railroad under the greatest of all these land grants. About 5,300 miles of railroads-the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, and the Northern Pacific-were built west of the Missouri River and north of Oklahoma with Government aid. That is all. And yet there are to-day out there in the West more than 58,000 miles of well-built railroad, and not a Government dollar for any above the original 5,300 miles. Is not that the answer to the charge that if we start in Alaska with 700 miles we will have ultimately to construct 10,000 miles? It is the answer. [Applause.]

WHAT HAPPENED 27 YEARS AGO.

We are told that we should not build the Alaska railroad because the Territory is barren and unpeopled. And yet the Northern Pacific ran through more than 1,500 miles of country so barren and so desolate that when Henry Villard took the foreign contributors to his famous "blind pool" of investors out to see driven the golden spike that united the eastern and western ends of that long line, they were disgusted with the aspect of the country. They said it was barren; that it could never produce tonnage for a railroad, which would be nothing but a streak of rust from nowhere to nowhere, meaning from St. Paul, Minn., to Tacoma, Wash.

Note that they used almost the exact words used last week by the brilliant Member from Oklahoma: "A streak of rust from nowhere to nowhere." And they had been over the road from nowhere to nowhere." And they had been over the road and through the country. Mr. Ferris has not been in Alaska.

The foreign members of Villard's party cabled back to their friends in Germany and England, and all hands dropped out of the pool—leaving Henry Villard to hold the sack and go broke. Think of it! The foreigners dropped out, Villard went broke, and the Northern Pacific went into bankruptcy, notwithstanding that enormous grant of every alternate section of land for 40 miles each side of the right of way, across half the width of the United States, including forests and fields worth the ransom of 100 kings. And this only 27 years ago.

Who cares for the extensive reports from the agricultural stations in Alaska? Would not reports from the Dakotas, from Montana, from Idaho, from Oregon, and from Washington have been just about as bad at the time the golden spike on the Northern Pacific was driven?

The cities St. Paul and Tacoma, whose prospects seemed then hopeless, are now two of the grandest cities in all the orthwest. Tacoma, which after the Northern Pacific collapse looked as if it might fade from the map entirely, is now a city of 100,000, and with municipal electric power offered to manufacturers at a rate as low as one-fourth of a cent per kilowatt, bids fair to become one of the great centers of the Northwestif not the greatest-located as it is on the grandest harbor of all the Pacific.

And there are the other grand cities—Portland, Seattle, Spokane, Butte, Helena, and all of the cities of the Northwest east to Minneapolis and St. Paul, which are all great centers of industry and activity.

Who doubts that Alaska has not its full proportion of the wealth of the Northwest, which less than 30 years ago seemed so desolate, so barren, so worthless, and so God forsaken?

We do not propose to exploit Alaska under a land-grant system. We will not let capitalists continue to exploit that Territory. What else is there to do but start things with a Government trunk line. It is land grant or the Government direct, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Hardy] has intimated.

And since it is inevitable that the pioneer trunk-line railroad in Alaska shall be built by the Government, why delay the initial step? Why hang back on a great venture that must come? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, marks in the Record. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my re-

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr.

BRYAN] is recognized.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] a while ago said he would not accord to Alaska a division of alternate sections as was done in the building of these western railroads, and by his entire argument he intimated if any such offer as that was made, capital would go up in Alaska and build these roads. Otherwise, a refusal to grant that kind of a permission to private capital would mean noth-

And so all these gentlemen who have asserted that there is nothing in Alaska, that Alaska is not fit for the building of this railroad, almost invariably assert they would not agree to the private capital concessions in Alaska that were granted when the building of the railroads to the Pacific Ocean was undertaken.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman permit? Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. I simply wish to reaffirm my statement, that I drew the line between the interior of Alaska and south of the range of mountains. My statement was with regard to the interior of Alaska.

Mr. BRYAN. I am glad the gentleman is unwilling to give away land for 40 miles on each side of the railroad to stimulate this building. It would be wrong to make such concessions.

The set and determined opposition to this bill in this House has come mainly from two sources: First, from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Fordney] and the gentlemen from Oklahoma [Mr. Davenport and Mr. Ferris]. Of course, there have been some reenforcements to-day.

These gentlemen have cast up considerable ridicule against Alaska as a natural resource and have expressed the opinion that the interior of Alaska is unfit for railroad development by the Government, and likewise all have called to the attention of Congress the great fallacy of the Government entering into private enterprise such as is involved in this act.

I shall devote most of my time to answering the argument directed against the Government ownership and operation of a railroad in Alaska by showing the absolute correctness and advisability of the Government ownership and operation of all railroads, both in the States and in Alaska.

The Government ownership of railroads was injected into the debate here and it was also injected into the debate over in the Senate, and was necessarily answered there; so I say we must meet that opposition here.

I shall accordingly dwell but briefly on the claim that Alaska is a gold brick on the hands of the United States Government and unfit for anything but to give away to the Alaska Syndicate. It very naturally devolves primarily on the able Delegate from Alaska [Judge Wickersham] and the Members of the House who are on the Committee on the Territories to defend this syndedid Territory, against these charges.

splendid Territory against these charges.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] exceeded the speed limit in satirical ridicule of Alaska and its people, as well as of the business men of Seattle and the great West, who believe strongly enough in the resources of Alaska to come here with their exhibit and present an optical and truthful demonstration of its resources. My views have not always met the approval of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce or of all the business interests which are identified with the State which I have the honor to represent, in part, here in this House, but I think it comes with poor grace for a Member on this floor to impugn the motives of a lot of men as has been done by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] when they have only tried to show to the Members of this House the resources of property owned almost exclusively by the Government. The gentleman characterized them as town-site promoters and selfish boosters. Yet their efforts in this matter are as patriotic as could possibly be put forth. They come onto the scene after the President has urged the development of this land of promise, endowed as it is with wealth of mine and agricultural possibilities.

These gentlemen seem called of some supreme power to warn this Congress of the impending danger which lurks in the form of a cloud in the Northwest. They want to save the country from the fallacy of developing Alaska in the way that the best judgment of practically all who view the situation unselfishly dictates.

The Guggenheims were the first men to be fooled by Alaska by believing things which these gentlemen would make us believe are false. The Guggenheims, notwithstanding the eloquence and learning and satire and ridicule of these gentlemen, still believe they are right and stand ready to build the railroad in Alaska if Uncle Sam will only divide up a small share of the Alaskan resources with them.

It was Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot who did the Government's part of the so-called locking up of Alaska. They slammed shut the door in the face of the Alaska Syndicate just in time to save resources which they believed were of inestimable wealth. They have not changed their opinion since the words of wisdom were "launched" from the mouths of these gentlemen.

William H. Taft and his administration held on fast to these resources, stimulated somewhat, I will admit, by public opinion. President Taft appointed a railroad commission and had the question of railroad construction in Alaska considered and take foundation for such construction. He thought the Alaska resources were fit to develop. He did not believe Alaska a gold brick, and we have before us the message of President Wilson, gaining by the experience of all that had preceded him, honest, sensible, conservative, urging the construction of this railroad by the Government.

To add to all this we have the vote of the United States Senate—46 to 16—in favor of appropriating $40,000,000 for a Government railroad in Alaska. These venerable Senators elected by the State legislatures favor this proposition, despite the racing sarcasm of this winged Pegasus, the great Ferris wheel from the land of Buffalo Bill and the broncho-busting pictures. [Laughter.] So he concludes that these business men who have abandoned their usual duties to present to Congress the truth about Alaska are here in a town-site scheme. If such an accusation be just, what about the Presidents of the United States and their Cabinets—Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson? Are they all animated by selfish purposes? And the 46 Senators. Are the 16 rock-ribbed gentlemen who voted against this bill in the Senate the only Senators who have wisdom and are able to avoid town-site schemers and faking boomers, such as the gentleman from Oklahoma characterizes these men who are here in the interest of this bill?

It seemed to me that the gentleman had exhausted his supply of gall when he concluded his arraignment of Alaska and her people and her supporters. His position was like that of the old colored preacher who made a terrific run to catch a train for an engagement. He caught the last car as the train pulled out, and, sitting down in his fatigued condition, he soon dropped back his head and went to sleep, his mouth wide open. A doctor who sat near took from his pocket a capsule of quinine and dropped a few grains on the old darkey's tongue. He soon awoke, and upon tasting the quinine began to make terrible faces. "What is the matter, Tom," inquired the doctor. "Well, Doctor, I'se just dun busted my gall." [Laughter.]

Doctor, I'se just dun busted my gall." [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Oklahoma, with all of his affability and kindness, is, it seems to me, a victim of a similar accident.

LEASING CLAUSE SHOULD BE ELIMINATED.

I favor this bill and urge its presage with more than ordinary enthusiasm, although there are certain amendments which I shall urge Congress to make, the principal one being the elimination of the leasing clause, and in event of the leasing clause not being entirely eliminated I shall seek to have the provision moderated so as not to "direct" or force the President to lease the road to private parties.

I favor the bill because it is right in principle, is just in purpose, and because it will repay the Government a thousand to one on the investment—by the revenues of the road and the development of the property of the United States Government in Alaska.

I shall oppose the giving of the resources of Alaska to a private syndicate.

The slogan of the Arctic Club, at Seattle—a splendid. aggressive, virile organization—and the slogan of the people of the Northwest who have the interest of this Territory at heart is "Develop Alaska." It would be a poor citizen, indeed, either of the Territory of Alaska or the great Northwest or of the United States, who would not subscribe to that slogan.

About 50 years ago the slogan was "Develop the West."

About 50 years ago the slogan was "Develop the West." The old soldier, the people of the country generally, wanted the Western States developed. Then, as now, transportation became an essential feature. Tremendous concessions of public lands were made to the railroads, and under the impetus of such concessions the timber domain of the people and vast landed estates of inestimable value were acquired by a few people.

When the people began to realize that Alaska must be developed and that the time had come to apply business principles and methods to such development there was an attempt to use the same principle of subsidies of public property and rights; but a change had come over the public mind, and no argument of expediency or public necessity could prevail over the determination not to make such concessions in Alaska.

But in stating my views as to this Government engaging in general railroad construction, I represent no party and no organization; I speak my own views; and I understand that I am the only member of the Washington delegation here on this floor that believes in the acquiring and operating of the railroads of the country by the Government as a policy that ought to be adopted at this time.

If the Democratic Party, taking this matter into consideration at this time, refuses to build a railroad in Alaska after the President and others who have studied this matter have recommended it, the conclusion is necessary that they have done this because of their opposition to the Government operation of railroads. There can certainly be no other excuse presented. Then the issue will be clearly and fairly drawn, and the Democratic Party will have gone on record on that proposition in connection with this legislation, although, if this bill is passed, it does not commit the Democratic Party to Government ownership of railroads.

I believe the Government ownership of railroads will become a plank in the platform of the Progressive Party before we go to bat for the Presidency in 1916. No other party aside from the Socialist Party will adopt it as a party platform, but I sincerely hope and believe that the Progressive Party will.

This Alaska bill has brought on the most free discussion of the proposition. The advance that the idea has made in the Senate shocked conservatives. The debates in the Senate show that Government ownership of railroads is regarded as a feasible proposition by a large group of Republicans, including Senators CUMMINS, KENYON, NORRIS, BRISTOW, and BORAH, and CLAPP and POINDEXTER, Progressives, together with quite a number of Democrats.

I do not favor our acquiring one transcontinental line to compete with the others and keep up the present expensive system of exchanging cars and all the other ills associated with the present bungled method of management. I favor acquiring them all and consolidating them into a nationally owned menopoly.

Mr. Chairman, when the officers of the French Army were holding a council of war and laying the necessary military plans to capture Toulon and raise the flag of the Republic over the ramparts of that city, a lean and sallow captain of artillery arose and, dissenting from the opinion of the majority, placed his finger upon a point on the military map of the city and declared "Toulon is there." It was the genius of Napoleon Bonaparte asserting itself. He assured these mighty men around him that Toulon could never be taken for the Republic so long as the ships of the allies were permitted to remain at the strategic point he designated. He deemed it necessary to take the city from the front, rather than to attempt to take it from the rear.

In my opinion the struggle now going on in this country between the people and the special interests for the control of this Government of ours will not be won by side attacks, by compromises, or by mere sham battles. The citadel of power from which the special interests operate and through which they retain their powerful hold upon the Government and all of its functions is the money power, and the right arm of the money power is the railroads.

"Consent of the governed" is a fundamental constitutional slogan in this country. The right to tax is a prerogative of sovereignty. About election time our Democratic friends are heard to exclaim all over the country their favored slogan of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

These slogans and catchwords are all right as long as there is any power to enforce them. But when we come upon an era in our national development when there is within the Republic an institution which can not be operated in any other manner than through the highest conceivable form of special privilege, to wit, as a monopoly, and when it must have as a necessary association of the right of monopoly the additional privilege to tax the public and to arbitrarily apportion the burden of taxation, the we must admit that our slogans, "Consent of the governed" and "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," have become as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

The railroads of this country have assumed such proportions that the power of the Government, the authority of its officers, and the force of its governmental machinery is slight in comparison. This great transportation machine has a capitalization in stock and bonds of over $20,000,000,000, and an annual expenditure for operation of over $2,500,000,000. It collects from the people a transportation tax by direct methods of over $3,000,000,000 annually and by stockjobbing and the devious tricks of the stock exchange they no doubt rob the people of another billion annually.

It has officers on its pay rolls receiving salaries in excess of that of the President of the United States, and so-called financial agents and trustees to whom a $1,000,000 cash commission is a mere bagatelle. It has 250,000 miles of track, equaling two-thirds of the mileage of all the railroads in the world. Through its transportation levies it enjoys the sovereign and kingly right of taxing the consumers and users of every imaginable form of movable property. The Wall Street bankers that own the so-called empire builders, whose duty it is to collect the taxes according to instructions and make due return thereof, have reached a position where they can laugh at any city or any section of the country that objects to doing their bidding.

NONE TOO GREAT, NONE TOO SMALL, TO ESCAPE.

We see great sovereign Commonwealths exempting the railroads from taxes; counties and communities taxing themselves in order to encourage their construction, while Wall Street bankers sell two or more dollars of stock and as much more in bonds for every dollar of assistance that is offered. Great daily newspapers, innumerable weekly newspapers, fall prostrate at the feet of the water boys of Wall Street, while they exchange their ill-gotten bonuses for the hard-earned dollars of the people. We find armies of men and women and children employees and beneficiaries dependent on the railroads for their support and compelled to aid the purposes of the railroads by ballot and by their word of mouth.

We find an army of trained lawyers throughout the length and breadth of the land, men whose intelligence and ability give them commanding position in the community where they live and mark them for leadership, on the pay rolls of the railroads at big salaries, which the people have to pay.

Such a tremendous organization as this has challenged our institutions, has challenged the sovereignty of our Government. It has the power; within it is the seat of sovereignty.

The farmers with their $10,000,000,000 annual crops must depend on railroads for transportation, and when a good crop comes it is the favored ones who can get the cars first, and those who can not impress their demand for cars by pull or special influence often see their products rot and become a total loss.

It costs more than $1,000,000,000 to run this Government. This sum is necessarily collected from the people. It is so collected that every individual in the United States pays a part of it. The people receive in return for the money paid into the Treasury the benefits the Government confers through its various departments and its many activities, involving education, agricultural training, cheap postage, the reclamation of arid lands, and the national defense by the Army and Navy.

The method of collecting this sum has varied from time to time, and it has ever been a struggle to prevent discrimination and special privilege from having undue influence in the assessment of these taxes. The tariff was used as a means of fostering special privilege to such an extent as to produce almost a revolution in the country. Through it certain sections were built up at the expense of other sections; certain industries were encouraged at the sacrifice of others; certain men were given princely fortunes taken out of the pockets of the public.

The transportation expense of the people is more than three times as great as the cost of running the Government. About $3,000,000,000 annually is collected by the railroads for their product—transportation. Like education and the different functions of the Government, this transportation affects every individual in the Republic. There are none so poor who do not pay their part of the transportation. The method of collecting this transportation tax of $3,000,000,000 has been generally left to the religendent the second of the religendent to the religion to to the railroads themselves. Every cent collected may be considered in exactly the same light as a tariff tax. In the collection of this gigantic tax certain sections have been favored. Certain shippers have received rebates. Princely fortunes have been made on account of unjust discriminations. If the people of this country were interested in the reform of the tariff with its few millions of contribution to the $1,000,000,000 expense of running this Government, they should be ten times as deeply interested in the collection of the $3,000,000,000 for transportation for the people. It must be remembered that it is not only the men who ride upon the train or the merchant or the manufacturer who pays the transportation tax, but every or the manufacturer who pays the transportation tax, but every individual pays a part of the tax whenever he eats a meal of victuals, buys a hat, or a paper of pins. The transportation tax is paid in part by everyone. The transportation tax is truly collected "at the source," the usual method being for the merchant to add 10 per cent for freight to every article as part of cost price before he offers it for sale.

THE RATE MAKER LEVIES THE TAXES.

The rate-making system of the railroads, instead of being a model arrangement, as the defenders of the special privilege of the railroads would have us believe, is the most gigantic travesty upon common sense or system in the world. It is said by Mr. Stickney, former president of the Chicago Great Western, quoted in the World's Work for November, 1910, that there are $6,000,000,000 different rates in existence, and that these railroad tax collectors are changing these rates every minute in every working day.

If published-

Mr. Stickney says—
these rates would fill a bookshelf 1,530 feet long with books 8 by 10 inches in size. They would make 4,000 printed volumes of 1,000 pages each, an aggregate of 4,000,000 pages.

With this conglomeration the railroads have been able to cover up rebates and special privileges given to their particular friends. As taxgatherers they have used this transportation tax to develop certain sections at the expense of other sections. The high-protection men here in Congress would build a tariff wall to protect an "infant industry." Factories would grow up in various sections of the country in a dozen or more cities. In time in one of these cities, where the "right people" lived, the railroad transportation-tax collectors would grant a special low commodity rate, and in a short time the other cities would find themselves short of orders, and the place that had the special rates would outstrip all other sections and become established as the great center for that particular product.

The railroads called it establishing "commodity schedules," and then these same captains of high finance would concentrate other enterprises at the same locations and continue to build up their own fortunes through unjust discrimination at the expense of the people of the rest of the country. The transportation discrimination became of infinitely more advantage than the tariff protection.

When the railroads propose to raise the rates they do not plan to raise the rates on the traffic of these great industrial combinations. It is not the commodity rates that they want to raise which involves the products of the trust. They pursue the line of least resistance and raise the class list and throw the burden upon the small merchant who gets a few crates of shoes for a retail store in the West or the immigrant who moves his household goods to a new section and on the necessaries of life.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP CHEAPER AND SIMPLER THAN GOVERNMENT REGULATION.

Every department of railroad activity has been subjected to some form of regulation until at this time the United States Government, through its Interstate Commerce Commission and some 48 State boards, many times in conflict with each other, assume the right to tell the railroad's management how it shall operate its trains, how it shall construct its tracks, what kind of material it must use, the kind of cars and rolling stock, the number of hours it can work its men, the rate it must not charge for its traffic. The railroads have pretended to submit themselves to all these forms of regulation and management until we have reached a situation that is ridiculous. Now it is proposed by the President to say how much bonds and stock may be issued by the railroads.

It is seldom you pick up a daily paper that you do not read of some railroad management "fixing it up" with the Attorney General out of court and receiving permission to proceed under the "constitution of peace" if it will "go and sin no more." The Attorney General files a suit and accuses a lot of subordinates of a New York banking house who are operating the New Haven road with violating the reasonable provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. The railroad approaches the rocks of financial thralldom with $45,000,000 of short-time notes due to the same Wall Street banking house. The banking house, ever ready to make a good turn, arranges to sell to the people—"widows and orphans"—for the consumers ultimately to pay, some $67,000,000 of new bonds, out of which the said banking house—whose characteristic in lending money is that it lends on character only—is to receive at first hand a cash commission of $1,670,000 for the payers of the transportation taxes also to ultimately pay, whether they have any "character" or not.

Powerful objection is made to the bond issue because of some alleged crooked jokers contained in its terms, and the banking house—founded on "character"—fails to get its commission. At once the underlings of the banking house, who have ostensible charge of the railroad, yield to the "reasonable" claims of the Attorney General under the "reasonable" provision of the Sherman Act, and it is agreed that the railroad will sell certain properties to some one else, to be again recapitalized at a higher valuation, no doubt, then all will be well, so far as the Attorney General is concerned; "but," says the Attorney General, "you will have to fix it up with the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the reasonable provisions of the Sherman Act in their application to the Sound steamers," although the Interstate Commerce Commission has no jurisdiction over water transportation.

What a monumental farce it all is. Does anyone suppose the payers of the transportation tax are going to be benefited by this arrangement? Does anyone dream that the banking house which operates on "character" will waive or lose its $1,670,000 rake-off, or that the others who are to get the remainder of the velvet between the $45,000,000 and the $67,000,000 will be forgotten? No; the velvet and the rake-off will increase at every turn, at the expense of the ultimate payers of the transportation tax, whom the Attorney General is supposed to be representing.

PRIVATE MONOPOLY THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.

The natural trend, the inevitable end, of the railroad organizations of this country is concentration and consolidation. The Government can no more prevent it than it can alter the tides.

Railroad monopoly is essential and inevitable, and it is the desirable and proper solution for those who are to pay the transportation taxes—the Joneses who pay the freight.

But private monopoly can not be permitted in this country. It is the unpardonable sin; it is blasphemy against this Republic for any set of men to place themselves in position where they can say, "We constitute a $20,000,000,000 monopoly, and in 20 years we will constitute a $50,000,000,000 monopoly. We will have power to make and unmake cities and sections. We now collect and disburse $3,000,000,000 of transportation taxes a year, which is paid in part by every living American citizen. Later we will collect $6,000,000,000 a year. Whatsoever we bind in this country shall be bound and whatsoever we unloose shall be unloosed."

It is impossible to keep these railroad companies apart. The Government can not promote artificial competition. roads are the people's delivery wagons. They do not produce anything in the world; they carry from place to place freight and passengers. Now, if the Interstate Commerce Commission can figure out what is a reasonable return on the investment in a railroad from here to Chicago and adjust that amount to the rate schedules, I can not see any sense in attempting to promote competition, separate companies, separate offices, separate officers, double equipment, and double investment so the people can have-what? All the people want is transportation, and surely all this manufactured competition will not cheapen that. The tendency of the Interstate Commerce Commission surely is to cut out all duplications and unnecessary expenses, letting the roads do anything that will reduce the price of transportation, having due consideration for safety and efficiency. only duty of the Attorney General is to get them apart, and it is none of his department's concern whether such a "reasonseparation as appears to him adequate will save dollars for the people or promote safety and efficiency. I do not believe that the people are going to find any profit in such service. To the contrary, the natural tendency of these transportation agencies to consolidate will have its way.

CONFLICTING REGULATION POLICIES.

Chairman Howard Elliott, of the New England Lines, in a speech at New York December 11, 1913, made the following complaint against the inconsistent regulation the roads were receiving from the two branches of the Government:

receiving from the two branches of the Government:

There is another respect in which the people of this country are dealing at cross purposes with the railways, and this is a question of transcendent importance not only in the field of transportation but throughout industry and commerce. This is a question of competition versus combination. The New Haven road is a consolidation of 180 companies; the Boston & Maine and Maine Central of 200 companies. Before the consolidation of these lines, when it was desired to move a carload of freight from one end of New England to another, separate arrangements had to be made and varying instructions issued for each railway and endless bargaining and higgling over rates and schedules, as well as the expense of many separate organizations. In this combination of separate railways in one organic whole there is the possibility of efficiency, under proper management, both from the standpoint of economical operation of the railways and from the public's standpoint of improved service. Because of practices incident to the great construction period of American development and not confined to railways, the people created the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has pretty effectually not only restrained competition, but stifled it so far as rates are concerned. As the commission has the power to prevent the railroads from charging unreasonable rates and to prevent unjust discrimination, it is a grave question whether it is not an economical error to object to combinations of railways which, under suitable management, can be made to serve the ends of efficiency by more economical operation and better service. Here again we find an inconsistency on the part of the people, who insist that the railways shall practice the greatest economy and efficiency in operation, but who at the same time object to principles that will further such economy.

Of course, the New Haven management previous to Mr. Elliott's responsibility has been outrageous, but it seems to me there is plenty of food for thought in his comments. All the legislation against pools and combinations has been practically futile. We have the Rock Island system, the Pennsylvania system, the Harriman system, the Southern Pacific system, and so forth. Who wants these systems disintegrated? Not I. I want to see all the systems monopolized into one great national transportation system, a transportation monopoly owned by the Government.

There is no way to prevent combination and monopolization of railroads. There is no use trying to prevent it. But we must not allow the railroad monopoly to remain in private hands. The railroads were built for the public, to serve the people. The same intimate relations should exist between the railroads and the people as between the postal system, the public roads, the great rivers and harbors, and the people.

Mr. Howard Elliott, of the New Haven road, in the same speech said the interests of the people and of the railroads are identical; that there should be no antagonisms. Certainly not; the people should own the railroads, just as they own the wagon roads, the highways, and the rivers. The railway corporations only live and exist by the consent of the people. The creator is greater than the creature.

MILD REGULATION SOUGHT AS ANTIDOTE TO OWNERSHIP.

About three decades ago a pronounced sentiment for Government ownership of the railroads developed and the railroads encouraged governmental regulation, intending mild regulation, sop. But now they are begging for less regulation. James J. Hill said two years ago that the roads were five years and $5,000,000,000 behind. Now, they think they are seven years and $7,000,000,000 behind. That they are poorly equipped and need to make tremendous expenditures everyone who has studied the situation must admit is true.

Their record indicates, however, that they have already received $20,000,000,000, which stands as a charge against the public as a basis for transportation taxes for all time to come. This $20,000,000,000, if ever paid, must be paid by the people who buy things that have about 10 per cent added to their cost for freight; yet the railroads are owned by private individuals— Vanderbilt, Gould, Rockefeller, Morgan, and others.

Yachts, racing stables, millionaire sons, European dukes and duchesses-this group grows richer every year and the cost of living piles up. They reach out and take over the industries of the country on the credit of their railroad securities. By labor-saving machinery, by increased output, and through better management the cost of production of coal, of oil, and of manufactured articles is continually lessened, yet the rates must go up and the fortunes of these men increase.

With harmony profound they cry now for higher rates and the big business interests second their demand, it being well understood that the increased rates will fall most heavily on the small merchant, the buyers of bread and sugar and rice and coffee, and most lightly upon the trust-made articles, in the control of which the big bankers of Wall Street have pawned the people's savings, depending mainly on "character" for security.

DEMAND FOR HIGHER RATES SHOULD BE DENIED.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission permit the rates to be raised. I for one will consider the act a violation of fundamental justice. The rates ought to be reduced and they would be reduced if the Goulds and the Rockefellers and the Vanderbilts and the Morgans had not for the past 20 years been drawing down such princely and fabulous sums in dividends, in stock and bond issues to themselves and to each other, in rebates, and in tremendous salaries and discriminations.

The postal rate has not raised-it has been reduced. The cost of education has not gone up. A boy or girl can get an education to day with less outlay, from whatever way you consider it, than he could 20 years ago, and a boy in the high school is as well posted as many college graduates used to be. Transportation on the public highways is cheaper and better than ever before. The auto truck is cheaper than the oxcart, and the consumer gets the benefit. Lighting and electric power is better and cheaper, and becoming still cheaper and better every day. The incandescent light has supplanted the candle every day. The incandescent light has supplanted the candle and the oil lamp, to the economy of the public, and the public gets the benefit. Lighting rates, water rates, heating rates, have all been made cheaper by modern inventions, and the public participates in the reduction. Street car rates are going down everywhere, by 3-cent fares, or by better accommodations, or by longer rides, or more liberal transfer privileges, and they will continue to go down for the benefit of the people.

But the railroad magnates, cutting their melons and rolling in wealth, want to raise the railroad rates. It was reported the other day that a rich magnate's widow in New York City had purchased a half-million-dollar city lot merely for the purpose of giving her poodle room for exercise and sunshine.

Why should the railroads alone, of all these public utilities, notwithstanding mogul engines, immense cars, big trains, scientific loading machinery, and the many improvements in railroading, want higher rates, except that they may cut more melons and divide up more securities among themselves? It is admitted that the railroads are suffering from financial stringency in many cases at this time, but there is great difference of opinion as to why they have reached this condition. Higher rates now would merely pave the way for still higher rates later on.

HOW THE RAILROADS AND BANKS ARE INTERLOCKED.

The following table shows what has become of some of their money. It tells part of the story of how the railroads are interlocked into the greatest monopoly the world has ever known:

In 1910 the railroads wanted higher rates and the following is a part of the interesting testimony given during the six months' hearing wherein Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, of Boston, acted as counsel for the traffic committee of the trade organizations of the Atlantic seaboard:

Commissioner Lane. Is there any reason to believe that these increases would stop with the present increase if it should be allowed? President Willard (of the Baltimore & Ohio). Increases in rates? Commissioner Lane. Increases in rates; yes, sir. President Willard. No; I think not. I think the tendency of rates will be to continue upward.

Commissioner Lane. You think there will have to be a progressive increase?

President WILLARD. Yes, sir.

O you Mr. High Cost of Living! Here is where you reign supreme in your native heath; here is where you spread yourself and laugh as the people try to stay your course.

"Progressive increase." Listen to the words of warning from the lips of Brandeis after he had listened to this testimony for six months:

Let the consumer beware of the vicious circle of ever-increasing freight rates and the ever-increasing high cost of living.

In that hearing Brandeis and the men he represented won. "Scientific management" was the admonition the railroads received.

The railroads urged that they needed higher rates in order to increase net income to meet demands for higher wages. They urged that increased rates were necessary because the possibilities of economics in operation had been exhausted.

A MILLION DOLLARS A DAY.

Mr. Brandeis opposed on several grounds, but he commanded the attention of the world when he told these railroad representatives that huge economies could be attained through scientific management that would save at least "$1,000,000 per day." In the conclusion of his brief in opposition to the granting of the demand for increase in rates, Mr. Brandeis said:

In the conclusion of his brief in opposition to the granting of the demand for increase in rates, Mr. Brandeis said:

This investigation has developed clearly that the railroads to meet any existing needs should look not without, but within. If their net income is insufficient, the proper remedy is not higher rates, resulting in higher costs and lessened business, but scientific management, resulting in lower costs, higher wages, and increased business. If their credit is impaired, the proper remedy is not to apply the delusive stimulant of higher rates, but to strengthen their organizations by introducing advanced methods and eliminating questionable practices. Thus they will main aln credit by deserving it.

Let the railroads heed the judgment recently expressed by a wise and impartial observer:

"The distrust of American railways by the people at large is not due primarily to overcapitalization, to overcharges, to undisputed instances of overbearing administration, or to overswollen fortunes made from unjust if not illegal manipulation of railway properties. The distrust is founded upon the belief that in the past railway men as a class have not sought the truth with a determination to act upon it, but have fought the truth regarding the social and economic relations of the railway. Railway managers of the type which Mr. Willard represents to-day cordially accept the principle of Government regulation, the abolition of rebates, the withdrawal of the railways from the practice of legislative lobbying, and the enforcement by law of the use of safety appliances, such as air brakes and couplers on freight trains. But all these reforms when they were first introduced were persistently and bitterly fought by many, if not most, of the influential railway men of the country. Is it surprising that the public should wonder whether it may not be necessary to force the doctrine of efficiency upon the attention of the railways by some external suthority like that of the Interrate Commerce Commission, just as it has been necessary to force upon their attention by legislative authority the desirability of regulation, of the abolition of rebates, and of the extension of safety appliances?"

Two years have passed and the railroads are again urging their "progressive increase" in rates. While their big effort is at the climax and it looks like the Interstate Commerce Commission is about to act after the ordinary big business interpretation of the "constitution of peace" and give the railroads the help they seek, the humiliating details of the New Haven collapse are exposed with all its minute exposure of devious manipulations by the New York banking house, founded on "character" on "character"

Here is the way the New York World chronicles some of these details in its issue of December 11, 1913:

A LOOTED RAILROAD.

No stockholder in the New Haven Railroad can remember the time previous to this year when it did not pay dividends of 8 or 10 per cent, nor the time when the railroads it consolidated did not pay large dividends.

previous to this year when it did not pay dividends of 8 or 10 per cent, nor the time when the railroads it consolidated did not pay large dividends.

Its stock had come to represent accumulations of two generations of hard New England thrift. It was the premier investment security of that section. It was not a Wall Street stock and not a speculative stock. Dealings in it on the exchange were few and far between.

It had become widely distributed among small investors. More than 10,000 of its 23,968 shareholders by the last report were women. Over 9,000 were individual men. Trusts and guardianships holding the stock largely for women and children numbered 3,702. Corporation shareholders numbered only 784.

Ten years ago this stock was selling as high as 225½ and had sold as high as 279. In the semipanic of 1903 it never went below 187½. In the great panies before that it never went down so far as to cause serious alarm. By yesterday's action of the directors it is now paying nothing, it has become a football in Wall Street, and is selling down to 71½, with hopes and not realities to hold it there. The 10,474 women and other holders whose yearly incomes from this source, generally small, had been $12,400,000, are now cut down to none at all, and large numbers of them have doubtless thereby been brought face to face with want at the start of winter.

Men and not events are responsible for this mighty wreck of a great investment property. These men were responsible for the Billard transactions which took away $3,000,000 for nothing in the Rhode Island trolley purchases; for the $12,500,000 which "vanished into thin air" in the Westchester & Boston deal; for the disappearance of other great sums in rounding up a perfected transportation monopoly of New England. These men made of this great property a never-ending source of huge bankers' commissions on new loans to cover these inflated acquisitions and fatten the pockets of the harpies of high finance. Their names are known. There is no mystery except the amount of

Before passing up the New Haven situation let all who are pleased with opera bouffe, who can pay their money for a fake and yet enjoy the farce, just look this way while Pierpont II, and yet enjoy the larce, just look this way while Pierpont II, in order to prove that character is the very foundation of the House of Morgan, resigns from the New Haven board and promptly notifies Attorney General McReynolds that he is aiding the Government by voluntarily dissolving interlocking directories, and asks to be admitted on the ground floor of the "constitution of peace."

Almost simultaneously the same Pierpont II is prevented by the hand of the law from gathering unto himself a $1,670,000 commission for lending some money at exorbitant interest and discount charges to the same road, which money was to be paid back to him or his associates for notes signed in his favor by the company while he was a director. The court could stand for the exorbitant commission, but the terms of the loan were deemed unconscionable. In truth, they were downright crooked, and revealed the character of a highwayman.

"I have resigned, Mr. Attorney General." The people will ask what good will that do. For my part I think there should be a law by which the House of Morgan could be compelled to stand by the little white slave it has ravished. The men who wrecked this magnificent property should be married to it and should be compelled to support it with their fortunes. They hold the bonds and mortgages, and the "widows and orphans" lose their dividends. Then, they issue more bonds and pocket more gigantic commissions and velvet, while their poor victim feels itself more and more debauched as it approaches the shoals of ruin and disaster. But the House of Morgan maintains its "character." "I have resigned, Mr. Attorney General."

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP ESSENTIAL AND INEVITABLE.

Without question, public ownership of the railroads is inevitable, and, for many reasons, the quicker it comes the better. Like the offerings of the Sybilian woman to Tarquin, the Roman Emperor, the price is ever increased, while the value and volume of the offering diminishes. The Government has already advanced far toward public ownership. The railroads recognize this fact. It is the universal claim of the railroads that unless the lines of regulation are relaxed, Government ownership will come, and the representatives of the people say to the railroads that unless they reform and submit to regulation cheerfully, the people will take the roads.

The Railway World, though strongly opposed to Government ownership, in March, 1909, said:

Government ownership is the inevitable consequence of the present system of regulation.

The late President Finley, of the Southern Railway, said in

I do not believe that the sentiment of a majority of our people is in favor of Government ownership, nor do I believe that Congress and our State legislatures are consciously moving in that direction; but I do believe that if some of the more extreme legislation already enacted is supplemented along the lines now proposed, the immediate result must be the breaking down of the system of private ownership.

Surely there has been no let up, and plenty of supplemental legislation has been enacted. Those who read the President's message yesterday will see that there is to be no let up in

Prof. Hadley, president of Yale, a firm believer in private ownership, sums up the situation in his work on "Railway and Transportation" as follows:

There is a strong popular feeling, to a large extent unsuspected by those in authority, in favor of Government ownership of railways as a system. No one can have much to do with the more thoughtful laboring man without finding out how strong the feeling is and what hopes are based upon it. The fact that the question is not now under discussion must not blind us to the fact that forces are at work which may prove all but revolutionary when the question does come under discussion.

Only a few weeks ago Chairman Thorne, of the Iowa State Railroad Commission, declared for Government ownership of railroads and expressed the opinion that Government ownership would lessen transportation taxes at least $400,000,000.

The Railway Age Gazette, very partisan in favor of private ownership and an advocate of the railroads from every standpoint, in its issue of December 12, 1913, recognizes that the question of Government ownership is now a burning question before the American poorle and press the railroads to meet the before the American people and urges the railroads to meet the question with the best arguments that can be presented. It question with the best arguments that can be presented. It says in part:

There recently has been a notable revival of the discussion of Government ownership of railways in this country. Two magazines, appealing to classes that can hardly be called the most intelligent, have been running series of articles advocating that policy. The chairman of one of the State railroad commissions recently has made an address and written letters trying to show that private ownership is costing the American Government $400,000,000 a year, and his utterances have called forth vigorous replies from President Ripley, of the Santa Fe. In Iowa steps have been taken to start an organized movement for public ownership, and it is reported that one of the United States Senators from that State will introduce a bill providing for it.

It may seem unfortunate for the railways that just when they are making the hardest fight in their history for fair regulation the question of the desirability of Government ownership should be raised. The Railway Age Gazotte believes that this is not unfortunate, but fortunate for both them and the public, and that the railways should meet the issue squarely and aggressively.

It has been inevitable ever since the present policy of regulation was entered on that in time, and in a relatively short time, it, and the controversies to which it was bound to give rise, would force the question of Government ownership to the front. Every time since the present policy of public control was entered on that the railroads have opposed any form of regulation they have been warned by its advocates that unless they submitted the worse fate of Government ownership would befall them. They probably will continue to be thus warned and threatened until the question of public ownership itself has been thrashed out; and until then this form of threatening probably will tend to secure the adoption of public ownership has been more thoroughly discussed, to feel that so long as the public refrains from taking over the roads it w

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP BEING UNIVERSALLY ADOPTED.

Many do not realize that Government ownership of railroads has been accepted by the verdict of practically all the civilized nations of the world as essential. The soundness of the principle that railway transportation, just as the Postal Service, is a Government function, has been recognized by 50 out of 54 nations. Only 4 civilized nations refuse to recognize the principle. These are England, Spain, Turkey, and the United States.

In England it is admitted that public sentiment is strongly in favor of Government ownership, and a royal commission has just been appointed to study the matter. In commenting on the situation in England, the Railway Age Gazette of December 5, 1913, says:

The growing interest in the subject of railway nationalization is strikingly illustrated by the recent appointment in Great Britain of a royal commission to inquire into the relationship between the railway companies and the State in respect of matters other than safety of working and conditions of employment and to report what changes, if any, in that relationship are desirable. The announcement comes almost simultaneously with that of the National Civic Federation in this country of its intention to undertake a national survey of social progress, which will include a study of the question whether regulation of railways and other public-service corporations is a failure, and whether State ownership should be substituted for that of private capital

Carl S. Vrooman makes the following comment on the progress of Government ownership of railways in England:

That a similar state of affairs exists in Great Britain, the only other first-class power which still holds firmly to the policy of private ownership and management of transportation facilities, is borne out by a statement which was made to the late Frank W. Parsons not long ago by Mr. W. M. Ackworth, the most conservative railroad authority in England, to the effect that nine out of every ten people in Great Britain would vote for public ownership if the question were submitted to a vote to-morrow.

In other foreign countries there were in 1910, 218,358 miles of Government-owned railroad to 98,786 miles of private owned. According to newspaper report, King Alfonso has agreed to a proposal of his cabinet that the Government should proceed to the nationalization of the Spanish railroads, and that for this purpose a bill will soon be introduced in the Cortes

The fact of the matter is that the industries of England and Spain, and in France to a partial degree, are being paralyzed by German manufacturers and producers because of the advantages Germany's Government-owned railway system gives to the people of Germany.

Martin Johnson, page 260, says that India fills her passenger trains at two-fifths of a cent a mile. In Switzerland you can ride half a month for $8.60 over all the steam, electric, and steamboat lines of Switzerland, or you can ride a whole year at a cost of 20 cents per day.

Quoting further from the same authority:

Quoting further from the same authority:

The public system of Belgium will carry you one-half a month for about $4.50; so also the public system of Hungary will carry you at the same rate. Hungary will also carry you, third class, 944 miles for $2.70, which is one-tenth of the charge here. The public system of Italy will carry you 963 miles for $7; the public system of Sweden 1,400 miles for $8.55; and that of Russia about 2,000 miles for $6. The Belgian system, furthermore, grants weekly tickets to workmen, good for six round trips or twelve rides, for distances and at rates as follows: Three miles, 19 cents; 6 miles, 24 cents; 12 miles, 29 cents; 24 miles, 39 cents; 31 miles, 43 cents; 62 miles, 61 cents. It will thus be seen that the Belgian laboring man can go to his work 62 miles distant, or return, for 5 cents, or a rate less than one-twelfth of a cent a mile.

These rates of travel promote the mobility of labor by enabling a man to go from his suburban place to the shops to work, and in many other ways.

PRESIDENT WILSON FOR GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP IN ALASKA.

But it is not only England and Spain that are taking steps toward Government ownership of railroads. What does President Wilson mean in his message when he says:

A duty faces us with regard to Alaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative; perhaps I should say a double duty, for it concerns both the political and the material development of the Territory. The people of Alaska should be given the full Territorial form of government, and Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of railways. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

"These the Government itself should build and administer." Is not that strong enough? But President Wilson goes further and tells you the reason why, "In the interest of all who wish to use them."

Here you have the law and the prophets on this great question. Heretofore the idea of the railroads being built and administered in the interest of those who use them has not taken possession of the lawmaking power of the Nation. empire builders, so called, at $100,000 per year salaries, have preached all over this country at $100 per plate banquets, where they had been transported in luxurious apportioned palace cars at public expense, that the people and the traffic were for the railroads, not the railroads for the people. Spheres of influence were created, and the railroad genius, the traffic manager, would proceed to fleece the people under the rule of "all the traffic would bear.'

It was not left to the people to buy where they pleased and from whom they pleased. Not at all, the railroads picked the jobbing centers and named the jobbers. They did not allow little flour mills in small towns, but by their rates promoting more business and more profit for their lines they told the farmers where they must ship their grain to have it milled.

In this speech I can not go into details too much, but I will cite an illustration taken from an interstate commerce case and mentioned in Rankin on "An American Transportation System," page 460. Salt is one of the necessaries of life, and manifestly a tax levied on all salt products affects every human being. Salt is produced in Michigan and in Kansas and other places. In order to protect the salt mine in Michigan without any thought of making the railroads serve the people who used them rates were established as follows:

From Michigan to St. Louis, 611 miles, 10 cents per 100 pounds.

From Kansas to St. Louis, 575 miles, 234 cents per 100

From Michigan to a Nebraska point, 504 miles, 15% cents per 100 pounds.

From Kansas to same Nebraska point, 247 miles, 19 cents per 100 pounds.

Take the present rate on rice from New Orleans to Omaha, 44 cents per 100 pounds, while from New Orleans to New York and Philadelphia the rate is 30 cents per 100 pounds, although the distance is nearly twice as great.

The framers of the Constitution made it impossible for Congress to levy any such outrageous tax or establish such a discrimination whereby people would be penalized 14 cents per hundred pounds on food products for living in Omaha rather than in the City of Brotherly Love. But the railroads are more powerful than Congress, and the Constitution does not affect them in this particular, at least. What would you think of such a discrimination in parcel-post rates? What does the con-stitutional provision giving Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States amount to so long as the sail commerce between the States amount to so long as the rail-roads transport all the commerce and make all the rates?

President Wilson wants the railroad system in Alaska owned by and controlled in the interest of those who "use them." I would like to see the complexion of the Democrat who will say that President Wilson does not want the same ideals, the same principles of justice and decency, to apply in New York, in California, in Washington, and throughout the country.

Why should the railroad barons apportion this country of You can not control them here any more than you can in Alaska. They were just as brutal, just as criminal, just as heartless, and just as corrupting in the States when they had the power. Think of the New Haven outrages committed here before our eyes. I guess, though, I ought not to mention that, for that has all been cured now and atoned for since "I have resigned, Mr. Attorney General."

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN FOR GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

You say the President does not believe in Government ownership in this country. I refuse to believe such is the case; but I know a great Democrat who does believe in Government ownership of railroads. And if you Democrats do not stand with Woodrow Wilson and William Jennings Bryan in this you ought to join the old Republican Party. There are many vacant places in their ranks which they are so anxious to have filled that even Democrats would be welcomed.

Here is what our great Secretary of State, whom the people throughout the length and breadth of the land love so well, said after he had visited all the great capitals of Europe and had ridden on Government-owned railroads all over the world:

I have been slow in reaching this position and I can therefore be patient with those who now stand where I stood for years, urging strict regulation and hoping that that would be found feasible. I still advocate strict regulation and shall rejoice if experience proves that that regulation can be made effective. I will go further than that and say that I believe we can have more efficient regulation under a Democratic administration with a Democratic Senate and House than we are likely to have under a Republican administration with a Republican Senate and House, and yet I would not be honest with you If I did not frankly admit that observation has convinced me that no such efficient regulation is possible, and that Government ownership can be undertaken on the plan outlined with less danger to the country than is involved in private ownership as we have had it or as we are likely to have it. I have been brought to regard public ownership as the ultimate remedy by railroad history, which is as familiar to you as to me. Among the reasons that have led me to believe that we must, in the end, look to Government ownership for relief I shall mention two or three. First and foremost is the corrupting influence of the railroad in politics. There is not a State in the Union that has not felt this influence to a greater or less extent. The railroads have insisted upon controlling legislatures; they have insisted upon naming executives; they have insisted upon controlling tegislatures; they have insisted upon make a property in the representatives on tax boards that they might escape just taxation; they have watered their stock, raised their rates, and enjoined the States whenever they have attempted to regulate rates; they have obstructed legislation when hostile to them, and advanced by secret means legislation favorable to them.

Another reason which has led me to favor Government ownership is the fact that the people are annually plundered of an enormous sum by extortionate rates; that places are discriminated against and individuals driven out of business by favoritism shown by the railroads. You say that all these things can be corrected without interference with private ownership. * * Is there any Democrat who is not willing to go as far as President Roosevelt and admit the necessity of Government ownership in case the people are convinced of the failure of regulation? I can not believe it.

Later, in commenting on his utterances advocating public ownership of all railroads in this country, Mr. Bryan, at Louisville, Ky., in September, 1906, said:

In my speech at the New York reception I made a brief reference to the Government ownership of railways, and I thought I had expressed myself so clearly that my position could not be misconstrued even by those who desired to misconstrue it. The New York speech was prepared in advance. It was not only written, but it was carefully revised. It stated exactly what I wanted to state, and I have nothing to withdraw or modify in the statement therein made.

Notwithstanding these authorities, gentlemen on this floor become excited about the "Socialistic fallacy" of Government ownership. If you abhor such a doctrine as this, why do you hold up Woodrow Wilson as a supreme exemplar of perfect idealism?

If Government ownership of railroads is wrong, why did you delegates at Baltimore wait for the word of your peerless leader and accept that word when spoken as both vox populi and vox Del?

Yet the gentlemen from Oklahoma [Mr. Davenport and Mr. Ferris], the State where Government ownership is a fundamental constitutional principle of the people, would degrade Alaska by their unjust and unwarranted strictures in order to warn the Congress against "launching" into a Government-ownership enterprise.

The minority report of these gentlemen from Oklahoma indicates that they would favor stimulating private construction by concessions from Alaska's storehouse, although in their speeches they would have us believe Alaska has no storehouse and nothing to put in a storehouse if it had one. Whatever may be said about the wisdom of those who made these tremendous land grants and concessions to the railroads in a bygone day to stimulate construction in the Western States, surely none will deny that had it been possible for the men at the helm in that day to look down the vista and see the situation that prevails to-day, their concessions would have been wrong, for it is plain that the Government could have constructed the railroads, using the property and the subsidies that were granted, and have owned them without the outlay of any considerable sum in addition thereto, and surely without the stock jobbing and stock watering and political corruption that have prevailed.

The gentleman can not present any good reasons why the Government should not own the railroads of the country. Had not these gentlemen and the gentleman from Michigan injected into this debate the general proposition of Government ownership, this entire matter might have been considered from a different standpoint in Alaska, but the issue has been raised and it should be met.

Out in my home city there is an old picture faker—whose proclivities along that line are fully set forth in the Congressional Record of July 29, 1913, at page 3254, and of November 22. 1913, at page 6737—named Blethen, who publishes a big afternoon paper, the Seattle Times. In a recent issue of that quack-doctor-advertising sheet published by this curling-ironed, long-haired, old eccentric the following appears:

"In pretending to make an issue of the proposal to lease the Government railroad," said a prominent Alaskan this morning, "Bryan is dodging the issue and simply playing to the gallery. The bill dees not contain a direct proposal to lease the Government railroad, but in order to obtain the votes of those in Congress who sincerely oppose Government ownership and operation of railroads on principle, a clause providing that the President may lease the railroads was inserted."

I have no regard for the criticisms of this old man. But it tickles me to see the old fellow thus popping off at the mouth with wrath against Government ownership of railroads, but restrained from saying so because Alaska affords so plain and conclusive an argument for Government ownership, and the sentiment of the people at Seattle indorses the plan so heartly that he can not say what he wants to say. This is the situation in which the entire reactionary crowd find themselves on the Pacific coast. They can not make any points against Government ownership while the Alaska question is up.

"UNALTERABLY OPPOSED "-WHY?

But the situation is different here in Congress, and we hear one of the richest men in Congress, a wealthy lumberman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], raise his voice against it.

Eirst_

Says the gentleman from Michigan-let me say I am unalterably opposed to Government ownership of railroads.

Personally, I have no lack of confidence in the gentleman from Michigan, and I have no doubt that he won his wealth honestly under the rules of the game, which he had the honor of helping to make here in this House. He is plain-spoken and is out in the open in the fights he makes, but in considering his "unalterable" opposition to this proposition, we have a right, without being considered personally offensive, to consider the gentleman's views on other subjects.

The gentleman from Michigan is a high protectionist by principle. He believes in that theory, and so votes whenever opportunity is presented. He was an Uncle Joe Cannon man here in the House. He opposed the amendments of the rules, and, with other high-protection men at the same time, stood with the manufacturers of this country on the tariff. He has always aided the beneficiaries of the high tariff to hold fast to the special privileges they had through the collection of this tariff tax of about $300,000,000.

And here there are $3,000,000,000 of transportation tax involved. Is it any wonder that these high-protection men should be opposed to the Government and the people taking over and owning the machine that collects these taxes? They do not want the transportation tax distributed equally among all the people. They did not want the tariff tax so distributed.

They do not believe in the people. They opposed the income tax, because through it their special privileges would surely be attacked. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Fordner] voted against submitting to the legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution permitting Congress to pass an income tax. He did not want the initial step to be taken toward permitting the tremendous income of a few men, obtained in all these devious and uncertain ways, to be attacked. He did not want, by his vote, to permit the legislatures of the several States to have an opportunity to amend the Constitution of the United States and thereby make it possible for a Congress to pass an income tax in response to the demands of the people.

OPPOSED TO PUBLIC OWNERSHIP OF THE GOVERNMENT.

I say that these high-protection men, these men who have obtained for their friends and themselves so many special privileges in the past, are afraid of the people. They do not want the people to own this Government. And it is not surprising that they would not want the people to own the transportation system. Why, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Fordner] voted against submitting to the legislatures of the several States a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the direct election of Senators by the people. He did not want the people of the several States to have so good an opportunity to take a step as important as that in acquiring possession, not of the railroads but of the United States Senate. "No" was his answer to the roll call.

In his reference to the public building in his district, which I understand was at Owosso, the gentleman said:

I inderstand was at Owosso, the gentleman said:

I obtained, through the courtesy of Congress, an appropriation for a Government building within the district which I have the honor to represent here—in part, at least—of $70,000. Ten thousand dollars of the money was used by the architect and superintendent. A prominent contractor in my home town told me he would take the contract for constructing that building for one-half the money it cost the Government, and believed he could make money out of it at that price. Those things create an impression upon the mind of a man who gives some attention to business affairs.

I notice in the first place that the gentleman says he obtained the appropriation for this building through the "courtesy of Congress." I understand this system has been abolished and that appropriations are now made on a different basis than courtesy. But this is not the only improvement that has been made since the "good old days" of "Cannonism and courtesy."

I have obtained the following figures pertaining to the building at Owosso:

Net cost of building Superintendence	$3, 840. 35	$52, 863. 91
Prorated share of cost of meeting overhead costs in Office of Supervising Architect	2, 100, 00 96, 71 72, 45

Total costs referred to by the gentleman 6, 109. 51

Cost of building 58, 973. 42

Cost of site 6, 026. 58

Cost of building and site 65, 000. 00

It will be noticed that the gentleman's statement that $10,000 was consumed by the department here involved an overstatement by the gentleman of $4,000, in round numbers—663 per cent off.

It is fair to say for the Office of the Supervising Architect, which is being administered on a very efficient basis, that conditions have changed in this office since the erection of the building under consideration. Before the passage of the public-building act of May 30, 1908, the specific cost of superintending each public building was charged to the appropriation for that building and all the other costs of supporting the Office of the Supervising Architect each year were prorated among the buildings under construction. This gave rise to criticisms and complaints, and Congress created, in the public-building act referred to, a new appropriation, since known as "General expenses of public buildings," which was made available for the support of the Office of the Supervising Architect, including the cost of superintendence.

After criticizing the Government in connection with the building of the Federal building, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] went after the Reclamation Service in his speech on the floor of this House. It seems rather natural that one should handle the subject of irrigation in connection with the discussion of the railroads, for there is more water in railroad stock than can be found in any other dry proposition in the world.

In May, 1879, when the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad was formed, the fixing of the amount of the capital stock was a much-discussed question. Jim Hill wanted to hold it at $5,000,000. George Stephen wanted it $25,000,000. He argued that they might as well put the stock up to begin with, for if they tried it later there would be raised the "demagogic" cry of "water."

"Water," said Hill; "we've let the whole of Lake Michigan in already!"

Their differences were compromised at $15,000,000-for what was a difference of $20,000,000—all excess water—between "empire builders," especially since the real builders of the West—the farmers, the artisans, the merchants, the home builders yet to come to the West—would have to pay the debt and the dividends and interest for all time to come and make it a source of revenue, not burden, to these private fortune

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Fordney] expresses the stock argument of opponents of Government ownership of the railroads and of public ownership, whether municipal or otherwise, when he makes the following statement:

I never knew anything built or operated by the Government that, in my opinion, was built or operated for as reasonable a sum as it could be built or operated by private enterprise.

Then he proceeds to attack the Reclamation Service. referring to the beginning of that great service, of such vast benefit to thousands of people residing in portions of the West, where are these one-time arid lands that have been made to blossom like the rose by the application of Government enterprise where private enterprise in many cases had fallen down, he makes this statement:

I want to call his attention to a report by ex-Secretary of the Interior Garfield and Mr. Pinchot, who was Chief of the Bureau of Forestry, under a law providing for the construction of irrigation projects to be begun in this country and paid for out of a certain fund created by receipts of money from the sale of public lands in the various States. The grandest corps of engineers ever gathered together in any country under the sun, so they said, were engaged by the Interior Department to estimate the cost. After the estimates had been completed Messrs, Garfield and Pinchot reported that 32 projects in this country, in the Western States, would cost $48,000,000. The law provided that no one of those projects could be begun until there was sufficient money in the fund to complete the work. But instead, when there was less than $25,000,000 in the fund, this work was commenced; and later on, when the representatives of those projects came before the committee, they admitted $75,000,000 had been spent and not a single one of the projects completed, and that it would require $75,000,000 more to complete the 32 projects estimated by the board of engineers to cost $48,000,000.

I have inquired and sought diligently for the report and estimates referred to. I am quite sure that no such report or estimates exist, and that the gentleman from Michigan has become the victim of a faulty memory and a vivid imagination. The officers in charge of the Reclamation Service can give me no information, but have informed me that they believe the statement of the gentleman from Michigan is an error. I have inquired of Mr. Pinchot, and he asserts that the gentleman is entirely mistaken; that there is no such report in existence.

As to the statement by the gentleman that the reclamation law provided that no one of the projects could be begun until there was sufficient money in the reclamation fund to complete the work, it can be said that the reclamation act does not make such a requirement. It provides, in section 4—

That upon the determination by the Secretary of the Interior that any irrigation project is practicable he may cause to be let contracts for the construction of the same in such portions or sections as it may be practicable to construct and complete as parts of the whole project, providing the necessary funds for such portions or sections are available in the reclamation fund.

No portion or section of a project, usually called "unit" of a project, has been begun, according to information furnished me by the department, without having available in the reclamation fund the moneys to pay the entire cost thereof. The Reclamation Service has to date completed 26 separate units of 17 projects and is ready to furnish water for irrigation. There are five projects on which the Reclamation Service is furnishing water to very large areas preliminary to the formal opening. GOVERNMENT CAN BUILD AND OPERATE ECONOMICALLY WHERE PRIVATE CAPITAL FAILS.

But the greatest error of the gentleman from Michigan is not in his details, but rather in his unfounded conclusions, for the Reclamation Service furnishes most abundant proof of the fact that the Government can build and operate enterprises both economically and with perfect efficiency; and, above all, this Reclamation Service exhibits a field in which private enterprise is futile and unable to meet the requirements of the situation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I will yield.
Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Washington has exhibited a good deal of information as to what other Members have said about public affairs. Did he ever hear of the gentle-man who offered to take over the running of the Government's affairs for about a million dollars less per day than is paid by the Government?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I have heard about Senator Aldrich's proposition; and I will say as to that that if anybody in the world was in a position to know about the Government's irregularities, certainly Senator Aldrich ought to know. I would not be a bit surprised if the gentleman told the truth. He is very able and very astute. The lieu-land proposition and the old methods of looting the public domain in former times and the placing of the public resources into private hands did waste a tremendous sum, and Senator Aldrich was perhaps right in his estimate of the sum.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That statement was not made in regard to public lands. It was made in regard to the running of the mere administrative departments of the Government in Washington.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I would not be surprised if the administrative departments could be run at a great deal less expense than they are run.

But right here is the point in question: Heretofore the Government has been devoting its attention purely to these matters of administering the departments. That is where the expense has come. No better specific illustration of the efficiency of Government operation can be had than in the administration of the Reclamation Service, where the questions of equalizing expense and income are involved.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Campbell] or the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Bryan] or anybody else seriously think that Senator Aldrich made the statement that has been attributed to him?

Mr. BRYAN. I read in the newspapers that the Senator made a statement as to the large amount of money that could be saved if the Government would take his advice. Does the gentleman from Illinois say that the Senator never made such a statement?

Mr. MANN. I do not think he ever made such a statement. Mr. LAFFERTY. If the gentleman made that statement it would be in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I am quite sure he did not make it. Mr. BRYAN. The Government of the United States, in the Reclamation Service, operates a railroad out at the Arrow Rock Dam, in Idaho. It is a standard-gauge road, and its construction through a rough, rocky country cost the Government about $22,000 a mile, including equipment. I have it set out further on in my speech, and it shows how the Government operates a railroad when it is necessary to do so.

I may say also that the Government operates out there a coal mine. It is operating a mine and producing coal at about $1.50 a ton. So that the Reclamation Service affords the very best illustration that the Government can do many things that involve the expenditure and collection of money where private enterprise fails.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. BRYAN. Yes; although I have but a few moments left, Mr. STEENERSON. How far does the gentleman carry the principle of public ownership? Does he include the operation of coal and iron and copper mines?

Mr. BRYAN. I think the Government is doing right in mining enough coal out there to supply the need of the Reclamation Service.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman believe generally in the management of coal mines and iron and copper mines and all the instruments of production by the Government? Mr. BRYAN. No; I do not believe in all that.

Mr. STEENERSON. Where does the gentleman draw the line?

Mr. BRYAN. I believe it would be sufficient for the present for the Government to mine enough coal in Alaska to supply the

Mr. BRYAN. As conditions develop it might be wise to go further in the matter, and I would be willing to mine coal and sell it to the consumer if necessary to reduce the cost of living. Mr. STEENERSON. How far does the gentleman want

Mr. BRYAN. During the early history of irrigation farmers and groups of farmers naturally confined their efforts mainly to diverting small streams in smooth valleys where the slope of the country and the topography were such as to make the work easy With the values of land then existing no expensive and cheap. development was practicable. Such development, proceeding for nearly half a century, irrigated in the aggregate a very large The farmers employed the cheapest class of conarea of land struction and seldom counted their own time in computing costs, which are hence reported very low.

As land values increased and the easier projects were developed, more and more difficult ones were taken up, sometimes successfully and sometimes not. As the more difficult problems were attacked, corporate capital and the district system were employed, and such projects as they could handle were gradually developed.

The increasing difficulty of carrying out many large projects led to the passage of the reclamation act for the avowed object of enlisting national funds for the development of projects not feasible for private, corporate, district, or State enterprise. This policy, avowed in Congress and announced over and over again by various officials in public talks, was followed by the Reclamation Service.

Many of the projects undertaken by the Reclamation Service had been outlined by private or public interests who had endeavored for years to enlist private capital in their construction. To this class belong the following projects, since taken up by the Reclamation Service:

Boise project in Idaho, Minidoka project in Idaho, Sun River project in Montana, North Platte project in Nebraska and Wyoming, Truckee-Carson project in Nevada, Rio Grande project in New Mexico and Texas, and Yakima project in Washington.

The Yuma project in Arizona and California was the successor of several unavailing attempts to place portions of the same land under successful irrigation. The Gunnison Tunnel scheme, Colorado, had been agitated for many years and efforts failed to raise private capital. Attempts were made to have it constructed with State funds, but without success.

Shortly after the passage of the reclamation act preliminary surveys were taken up on the Grand River project in Colorado. The data collected were considered by the Board of Engineers, who recommended the project as promising, and requested further surveys and data. Representations were made, however, that this project could be built by private capital or under the district plan, and for this reason the Reclamation Service suspended operation and withdrew from the valley for the announced purpose of permitting its construction by private capital. At the request of interested parties, the reclamation withdrawals of public land were continued for the purpose of holding these available for reclamation, with the understanding that they would be released in case private capital were enlisted in construction. After five years of effort the citizens of the valley petitioned Secretary Garfield to take up the project as a Reclamation Service project, representing that private capital could not be induced to enter the field. In the meantime an irrigation district had accomplished some partial development, by which a small portion of the best land situated nearest the water supply had been brought under irrigation and the project rendered far more difficult by the elimination of some of the most valuable lands and the increased value of the right of way necessary for the canal. Even with these increased difficulties the project was taken up by the Reclamation Service about a year ago and is now under construction.

GOVERNMENT SUCCEEDS WHERE PRIVATE CAPITAL FAILED.

The Government early made surveys on the Sun River project in Montana, and this was one to which attention was turned soon after the passage of the reclamation act. It was represented, however, by State officials that this project could be built by private capital under the Carey Act, and they preferred the public funds to be devoted to less attractive regions, such as the Milk River-St. Mary project. The Reclamation Service accordingly withdrew from the field. After protracted efforts to finance this project under the Carey Act, the Reclamation Service was informed that it was impossible to secure capital for this construction and was requested to construct it as a reclamation project. Although in the meantime the cost of construction had greatly increased, the project was taken up and is now under construction, about 16,000 acres being under ditch.

Most of the projects undertaken by the Reclamation Service had been abandoned after unsuccessful attempts to finance them as private projects, or else were new projects, so difficult as not to attract even the attempts of the promoter. therefore, were projects unattractive to private capital.

The difference in cost between the private works and the Government works is further accentuated by the greater probability of the water users under the Government projects receiving an adequate water supply. This matter has in all cases been given more careful consideration and deficiencies guarded against with greater care than in the private projects, all of which adds greatly to the costs.

Also on the projects of the Government, provisions have been made in some cases for drainage works, such as have not been covered by the costs of the private projects. As a rule, the water is brought nearer to the land to be irrigated under the Government projects than it is under the private irrigation projects. The character of construction work done by the Government is, moreover, superior to that done by the average private irrigation company. This difference consists in the use of concrete and steel instead of wood for construction, in the provision of numerous structures giving better facilities for distribution of the water, and substitution of concrete or steel structures for earthen structures where the former would be more safe and more serviceable, and in the lining of canals to prevent excessive seepage losses.

WASHINGTON FARMERS FAVOR GOVERNMENT ENTERPRISE IN RECLAMATION.

In the State of Washington, where I may speak with more familiarity of the work of the Reclamation Service, the engineers have already wrought a transformation which furnishes most convincing evidence of the efficiency and excellence of Government methods. In the great valley of the Yakima there are nearly a half million acres of land, the development of portions of which had been undertaken at various times by private interests. As a result of these activities, in which many organizations were engaged; an exceedingly unfortunate condition had arisen with respect to finances, and particularly in regard to grave controversies over water rights. As is only too often the case with enterprises undertaken for profit, the promoters had extended their works to cover areas far in excess of the water supply available. Without provisions for adequate and expensive storage reservoirs, there was always shortage of water This resulted in almost constant friction between the owners of canal systems, a heavy loss of crops, and, later, recourse to the courts. The statutes governing water were incomplete and the court calendar was crowded with litigation of contestants. Without the necessary legal machinery for adjudicating the appropriations of stream flow, a condition arose where the total appropriations exceeded the actual supply by a hundredfold. In fact, the situation at the time the Gov-ernment appeared in the valley was extremely critical, and actual violence occurred in the blowing up of dams and in frequent personal assaults. The key to the situation was the Sunnyside Canal, which was early secured by purchase by the service. By infinite tact and diplomacy, but only after several years of strenuous effort, the Government finally succeeded in obtaining an amicable adjustment of all the conflicting rights to the stream flow. It then proceeded upon the large engineering features involved in the utilization of a number of mountain lakes at the headwaters and in the construction of the large dams and several hundred miles of extremely difficult and expensive canals. By putting dams at the outlets of the lakes their capacity was enormously increased, the losses of flood waters eliminated, and an ample supply for irrigation guaranteed. Some of these works are monumental in character and are built in a manner to reflect credit upon the Government engineers. The Tieton Canal for 12 miles was excavated on the side of a steep canyon several hundred feet above the river. Twelve miles of it had to be lined with cement and 2 miles of it are in tunnel. The construction of the canal was attended with great difficulty.

The lining of the canal was accomplished by manufacturing the forms in several camps located along the Tieton River, and the forms were afterwards transported to the canal by cable and tramways. All the old ditches taken over by the Government were enlarged and extended and new lateral systems were constructed to cover additional areas. On the Yakima project the total investment, on June 30, 1913, was $6,294,000. In 1905, the first year water was supplied through the Government operations, the total acreage was 40,000, and the value of the crops was $2,000,000. In that year the farms numbered 1,250. On June 30, 1913, the acreage had increased to 71,550, the farms to 3,290, and the value of crops to $3,672,950. Since the Government entered the field crops to the value of $22,200,872 have been produced. As a creator of values, it might be mentioned that the 3,290 farms included in the Yakima units have an estimated gross farmers' investment of $18,305,000, including land, equipment, and live stock.

The gross value of an annual crop here is equal to 67 per cent of the total investment of the Government in reclamation works. The guaranty of an ample water supply has resulted in an average value of more than $200 per acre.

It is safe to assume that the investment of $6,294,000 of the Government to date has already increased the value of taxable property by 50 per cent, and this by no means measures the increase which will follow the continued development now assured this valley.

The Okanogan project in northern Washington occupies a remarkable valley, wherein the climatic and soil conditions are extremely favorable for the production of crops of special and high values. This region, owing to its freedom from early and late frosts, is often described as the California of the Northwest. Delicate fruits, like peaches, pears, and other varie-Northwest. Deneate traits, the peaches, pears, and other value ties; English walnuts and almonds all do well here, while apples attain perfection in size, flavor, and color. On this project the Government has expended about $632,000, and last year supplied water to 7,473 acres on 441 farms. The greater year supplied water to 7,473 acres on 441 farms. The greater portion of this acreage has been planted to orchards, only a fraction of which have yet come into bearing. Although the Government canals only began to supply water in 1908, the total value of crops grown to date is equal to 76 per cent of the entire expenditure for reclamation. The latest estimate of the reclaimable area, as proposed by the Government for these two valleys, is 328,000 acres, and the total estimated investment will probably exceed $12,500,000. On the basis of the productive capacity of the land, when fully reclaimed, this acreage in a single year should at least equal the entire investment of the Government

The available storage on the Yakima project in 1913 was 276,000 acre-feet; on the Okanogan project, 15,600 acre-feet. Mileage of canals: On Okanogan, 48; on Yakima project a total of 772 miles of canals are in operation.

A total of 8,898 canal structures have been constructed.

The following interesting statement shows in part the stupendous work of the Government in the Reclamation Serv-

It therefore appears, in spite of the fact that the Government work is controlled by an eight-hour-law restriction and by considerations necessary for guarding the public interests, that the irrigation works of the Reclamation Service have been cheaper than have corresponding private irrigation systems. This is as it should be, because the private irrigation companies are in the business of constructing irrigation works for a profit, and this profit must necessarily be paid by the water

Yet the gentleman from Michigan, a noted advocate of the horde of "infant industries" which have always proclaimed that they could not live without Government aid and protection,

I never knew anything built or operated by the Government that, in my opinion, was built or operated for as reasonable a sum as it could be built or operated by private enterprise.

GOVERNMENT ENTERPRISE THE SOLE HOPE OF RECLAMATION.

Mr. C. J. Blanchard, statistician in the Reclamation Service, who has been very kind in supplying me with such data as I have requested in connection with this matter, recently made the following statement in an address:

An economic survey of the arid West at the close of 1913 furnishes interesting and indubitable evidence of the sound and substantial basis upon which the whole fabric of Federal reclamation now rests. The Government has demonstrated, first, that it can direct with skill and celerity and also with economy the prosecution of works of vast magnitude and costs; and, second, that in the special field of irrigation enterprises on a large scale it provides the only machinery to which the country may look for the development of the most important latent resources of 16 arid States.

GOVERNMENT GETS MORE FOR DOLLAR THAN HARRIMAN.

Mr. H. T. Cory, member of the American Society of Civil Engineers, in the course of a discussion by him of a paper by Mr. John H. Lewis, State engineer of Oregon, on State and National water laws, makes the following statement relative to the work of the Reclamation Service:

The Reclamation Service has made not a few mistakes. It would be miraculous if it had not, considering the magnitude of its operations; and even many of its supporters feel that a frank admission of them would have made its position, among those whose opinions are worth while, stronger than it is. Nevertheless, based on a fairly complete knowledge of the Salt River, Yuma, and Orland projects of the service and the observation and study of data examined during eight years of the Harriman lines in California, Arizona, and Mexico—six years as a maintenance and operation official, with unusual opportunities to observe—the writer is convinced that in these three projects at least the Reclamation Service gets more actual work for a dollar than do the Harriman lines.

I am glad the gentleman cited the Reclamation Service as an illustration of the impotency of the Government. If the gentleman had referred to the way the Government has been euchered out of its timberlands by great timber barons in Michigan and throughout the West he, perhaps, would have touched a subject on which he is fully informed and one wherein he could make more headway than in the field he happened to choose. The Reclamation Service affords ample evidence to disprove his statement.

The opinion of Mr. Cory is as good as that of the gentleman from Michigan and he says he is convinced that the Reclamation Service gets more actual work for the dollar than do the Harriman lines.

While we are on this phase of the subject, it is interesting to note that the Reclamation Service has already built two railway lines, one in Idaho, 19 miles in length, the other in New Mexico, 13 miles long. Both are standard gauge, and both are utilized in hauling enormous quantities of materials and sup-The Idaho railway for two years has been in operation with daily train service, passenger, freight, and mail bustbeing transacted. Both lines are in mountain country, with heavy rock cuts and bridges. On the Idaho railway the total cost was $19,037 per mile, and for the New Mexico line $21,085 per mile.

WATERED STATISTICS ARE CITED.

The gentleman from Michigan had a great deal to say about cost of railroad construction. He said:

Statistics show that the original cost of construction of railroads in the United States is $60,000 per mile.

No man who knows anything about the subject believes any such watered statistics. No intelligent engineer would listen for five minutes to such padded nonsense. The estimate for the Alaska Railroad is $48,000 per mile. And here we have the statement of the cost of Government construction in mountainous country in Idaho and New Mexico, with heavy rock cuts and bridges, at an average cost of $20,000 per mile.

The best authority on original cost of American railway construction is less than $30,000 per mile. The gentleman dia not say he believed this construction cost $60,000 per mile. He said "statistics show it." But perhaps the statistics consulted by the gentleman did not allow for the whole of Lake Michigan, which Mr. Hill said had been turned in.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] laid great stress on the cost of construction in Germany, but it is well known that in Germany, where population is so dense, the right of way costs much more than all other items combined. Manistly such figures can not be considered as having any bearing on cost of construction in Alaska, for in Alaska the United States owns every foot of the water front and practically every square inch of the land over which the railroad will run, and for thousands of miles on each side.

A GOVERNMENT RAILROAD IN SOUTHERN IDAMO.

The Reclamation Service, to which the gentleman so fortunately referred, also refutes his cost-of-construction fallacies and provides an illustration of a Government owned and economically operated railroad. It is not generally known, but it is a fact, that the Government, in order to construct economically the Arrowrock Dam, a single-track, standard-gauge railroad, 19 miles in length, was built by the Reclamation Service from the terminus of a branch of the Oregon Short Line Railroad to the dam site. Previous to the construction of the railroad, the cost of hauling freight over the rough wagon road was $8 per ton, and it was estimated that the saving in freight on the cement alone would very nearly pay for the cost of the railroad.

The road begins at Barberton, on the Boise River, 3 miles below the Boise diversion dam, 5 miles east of Boise, and lies on the north bank of the river for about half its length to Gooseneck, at a sharp curve in the river, where the road crosses and continues on the south bank to a point just below the Arrowrock camp, where one spur recrosses the river on a deck bridge to the camp and another spur extends along the river to the dam site.

The main line is 17 miles in length, with maximum grades of per cent. The roadbed is 18 feet wide in cuts and 14 feet wide on fills. The track is laid with 60-pound rails, with tie-plates on chestnut ties 2 feet apart. The spur tracks at the Arrowrock camp and dam site aggregate 2 miles in length and have maximum grades of 3 per cent and maximum curvature of 12 degrees. There are three bridges on the main line, as follows: That across the Boise River at Gooseneck, M. P. 9, consisting of two 150-foot through Howe truss spans and nine trestle bents of 15 feet 9 inches span each, total length 442 feet; Highland Bridge, at M. P. 15, consisting of a 50-foot through Howe truss span and seven trestle bents, total length 166 feet; Arrowrock Bridge, across the Boise River a short distance below the dam site, consisting of four 64-foot deck spans of Howe type and seven trestle bents, total length 366 feet.
Surveys for the line were begun in October, 1910, and construction of the railroad was begun in the spring of 1911. Most of the grading was done by contract, and this work was completed in October. It involved the excavation of nearly a quarter of a million yards of material, of which 12 per cent was lava rock. The contract prices per cubic yard were 25 cents for class 1, 70 and 75 cents for class 2, and 90 cents and $1 for class 3, with overhaul at 2 and 4 cents per cubic yard per 100 feet. All of the other construction work, including culvert and bridge building, track laying, ballasting, and so forth, was done by the Government forces. The tracks were completed to the dam the 1st of November and across the river into Arrowrock camp the 1st of December, 1911, and the ballasting, riprapping, fencing, and so forth, were completed in June, 1912.

Rails cost $25.70 per ton f. o. b. Chicago, ties 62½ cents each delivered on the right of way. The wages paid per day of eight hours were: Labor, $2.25; rockmen, $2.25 to $2.75; man and team, $4.75 to $5.

COST OF GOVERNMENT BAILROAD CONSTRUCTION.

The cost of construction per mile was: Grading, $7,100; bridges, $2,500; rails, ties, and switches, $6,200; track laying and hauling, $800; ballasting, $1,000; and the total cost, including surveys, right of way, culverts, fencing, riprap, buildings, and so forth, was about $20,000 per mile. The rolling stock consists of 2 locomotives, 2 passenger cars, 4 flat cars, 3 box cars, and miscellaneous equipment of hand cars, speeders, and so forth, costing about $35,000.

Teaming on the wagon road was discontinued on November 9, 1911, when the tracks were completed to the dam site. The first train crossed the Arrowrock Bridge to Arrowrock Camp on December 8, 1911, and on January 1, 1912, the railroad was turned over to the operating department of the service. train is run from Arrowrock to Barberton and return each week day, and two trips are made on Saturdays. The train crew consists of conductor, engineer, fireman, and two brakemen. The conductor acts as superintendent, the section gangs reporting to him. The total number of ton-miles of freight carried is over three-quarters of a million and the number of passengers about 45,000 to date.

COAL MINING BY THE GOVERNMENT.

But the idea of Uncle Sam, "pickax in hand," mining coal seemed to be the very climax of inconsistency to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris]. When he put his question to the House the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. Ferris. Is there a man in the Progressive Party, is there a man in the Republican Party or in the Democratic Party who would stand up here and advocate that the Federal Government ought to go up there with a pickax and dig that coal and load it onto freight cars? No good man would have the temerity to stand up here and advocate any such man would have the temerity to stand up here and advocate any such thing as that.

Mr. Bryan. Mr. Chairman, I certainly believe it will be all right for Uncle Sam to do that.

Mr. Ferris. There is one lone Progressive. [Laughter.]

Mr. Bryan. And supply the market with coal—

Mr. Ferris. Brethren, are there any others?

Mr. Bryan. It will be so much better than the West Virginia scheme and the Colorado scheme that there will be no comparison.

Mr. Ferris. Can there be others? Mr. Chairman, there is a sample of the Progressive Party for vou. What do you think of that?

Mr. Bryan. We could at least mine coal without suspending the Constitution, as was done in West Virginia.

I was alone in standing up here in this House, and the RECORD shows that there was laughter on the part of the Members. I have no doubt that some sneered at the suggestion, but I say here to-day that the mockers at this proposition are going to change their attitude.

Why, before the gentleman got his speech revised and published in the RECORD the local newspapers chronicled the fact that two United States Senators had expressed views favorable to the taking of coal mining into the hands of the Government, as a lesson growing out of the investigation of the West Virginia coal-mining situation. When men get possession of the fuel of the country and attempt to monopolize that necessary of life it is time for the Government to interpose its hand to promote decent labor conditions and equity to all concerned.

Mining of coal is important, and a proposed method of handling that feature is included in the bill I have introduced, but it seems to have been agreed that it is impossible to consider all these features while the railroad bill is pending. When the time comes for considering the coal mining I shall insist on fair regulation in Alaska. If I have my way, such laws shall be passed as to coal mining in Alaska as will make impossible such hardships as have characterized the West Virginia situation, where we have seen men sentenced by a drumhead court to long terms in State prison, without jury trial, while outlaw op-erators shoot down the innocent and terrorize the families of the miners who are demanding better conditions.

The coal of Alaska will be mined under different regulations. Never will the rifles of the guards crack in the coal regions of Alaska to drive back to work half-fed, poorly clad, overworked miners. We are going to see to it that the rules of the game are fair and honest. The bill I have introduced, which will be considered later, makes safety arrangements compulsory. provides for a compulsory living wage, together with adequate housing, industrial insurance, compensation for injured workmen, and it prohibits child labor. [Applause.]

But even here the Reclamation Service, brought into this discussion by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], affords a living illustration of the folly of those who think this proposition ridiculous or that the Government is not able to execute private enterprises and own and operate its railroads.

A GOVERNMENT-OPERATED COAL MINE IN NORTH DAKOTA

About three-quarters of a mile north of Williston, N. Dak., the Government is daily mining coal. "Uncle Sam with pick in hand," if you please. The fuel is mined to supply fuel for the power house in which electricity is generated for the several pumping stations.

The main entry to the mine is about 2,000 feet in length, 6 feet wide, and 6 feet high. The underground workings are at an average depth of 100 feet. Ventilating shafts secure good air. Perfect drainage is maintained, and the mine is kept dry for the workmen.

ONE OF THE BEST ARRANGED MINES IN THE STATE.

The State mine inspector inspects the mine regularly, and in a recent report says:

This is one of the lest arranged mines in the State and is kept in safe condition.

The average output is 100 tons per day. About 12 to 15 miners are employed and paid 60 cents to 80 cents per ton, depending The average output of a miner is 6 to 10 tons upon location. per day. On December 31, 1913, the report showed that 34,365 tons had been mined.

The net average earnings after expense for explosives and supplies is deducted are $3.50 to $5 per day of eight hours. Laborers on track work, hauling, and so forth, are paid $2.75 per day for surface and $3 per day for underground work. Miners are furnished with permissible explosives at a slight advance above cost. A mess is maintained at the mine where meals can be obtained for 25 cents. Sleeping quarters are furnished free. A bathroom with individual lockers gives the men an opportunity of using hot and cold shower baths. During the six years that this mine has been operated no fatal accidents have occurred, and only two or three serious ones. One miner had his leg broken by the fall of coal immediately after a blast. His net earnings were $4.72 per day, and he was paid this amount under the compensation act of May 30, 1908, during the period of disability.

The mine was opened in 1908, and up to 1913 was operated only during the irrigation season of about five months in each The average amount of coal mined has been about 5,000 tons per year, and on June 30, 1913, a total of 30,000 tons had been mined at a cost of $1.78 per ton, including all maintenance costs. In future, due to the fact that electric current is being supplied to the city of Williston under contract, the mine will be operated continuously, and it is expected that about 10,000 tons of coal will be mined per year and that the cost will be reduced, as it will not be necessary to maintain the mine idle for seven or eight months of the year. In 1911, during the five months that the mine was in operation, the cost of mining coal was $1.41 per ton, with a minimum charge of $1.31 in July.

EFFICIENT CONSTRUCTION OF PANAMA CANAL.

Panama Canal is an eloquent refutation of the charge that the Government is impotent when it comes to doing practical things. I do not believe any man with sense or patriotism would claim that the Government could have obtained as good results in this colossal undertaking through a contract let to private parties, or by granting a franchise to a syndicate. It became necessary for the Government to buy and operate a railroad in connection with this work, and no railroad in the world was ever operated with greater efficiency than that road is being operated. I commend to those who think the Government impotent in such matters the report of Col. Goethals. Is there a man living so devoid of national pride and fundamental patriotism as to take the position that Col. Goethals could not operate the railroads of this country, with all the systems consolidated into one national system, with the Government of the United States back of him, better than they can possibly be operated by the gang of lawyer presidents and banker trustees that now manage them for millionaire yachtsmen and dog fanciers that own them by virtue of voting trusts and bunco games and stockmarket tricks?

If such there be, go mark him well. He has a peculiar mental equipment.

THERE WILL BE A RUDE AWAKENING.

The trouble with some of these men is that they have had so much experience working the Government that they believe it impossible to introduce practical methods. They have seen the vast landed estate of the Government go to the railroads with an extravagance almost criminal. They have seen big timber barons get the timber without paying for it. They have observed the Guggenheims in the United States Senate helping to devote Alaska to their own interest, timbermen in Congress giving inside information, manufacturers and bankers on the floors of both Houses representing their special interests, all conspiring together under pork-barrel methods, until they believe the people themselves are imbecilic or crooked; but there is due to some of them a rude awakening.

The people of this country are going to level down some of these gigantic fortunes. They will take the railroads and pay for them. Then they will levy income taxes on the incomes to be made and will assess commensurate inheritance taxes on the fortunes already made. The idea of a $20,000,000,000 railway system of 100,000,000 people in a Republic being passed from father to son as a family inheritance, and then we Americans boasting that the people rule. Government ownership of railroads may be delayed, but it will surely come. If the railroads raise the rates $1, they will raise their capitalization $2, and it will complicate the situation and make it harder for the people to acquire the roads, but the delay is only temporary.

The following are some of the benefits of Government ownership of railroads:

1. A great financial saving to the people in interest and dividends.

2. Greater efficiency from a unified national system.

3. An equalization of rates and elimination of unfair discriminations.

Saving and convenience for the Government in carrying mall, troops, officers, fuel for Navy, and so forth.

5. Saving in buildings and multiplicity of offices and printed matter.

TWO MILLION DOLLARS A DAY CAN BE SAVED.

Brandeis said the railroads could save $1,000,000 a day by scientific management. The railroads pay over $400,000,000 per year dividends and $100,000,000 per year in excess of what the Government would pay in interest. Add these two items to the saving which Brandeis proposed and you will see that the people would save more than $2,000,000 a day under Government ownership.

One great national system would save in bookkeeping, in exchange of cars, in direct haul. Cars would not have to be hauled by circuitous routes to get them back home and freight would move as nearly in a straight line as possible.

Rates would be equalized. Discriminations would be eliminated. Water transportation would be allowed to play its natural part in the movement of freight. Combinations in restraint of trade would obey the laws, for the railroads would not handle goods made in violation of the law.

In the carrying of the mail there would be no more private railroad corporations to consider, and the troops and fuel for the Navy could move without delay and holdups by the railroad interests.

RATES IN GERMANY LOWER THAN IN AMERICA.

A great deal was said about rates in Germany, but the fact The splendid efficiency and economy of construction of the of the matter is that rates in the United States will not stand a comparison with German rates, when consideration is given to length of haul and other necessary features. It is conceded by all that the loading and unloading charges are the principal expense in freight transportation. In Germany the average haul is 70.7 miles; in the United States the average haul is 244.05 miles. Thus the rate per ton-mile averages lower in the United States than in Germany.

In Germany express is carried as regular freight. This is handled, of course, quite often and involves short local deliveries. Think of comparing the average rate per ton-mile on a carload of express packages hauled 100 miles and delivered at points along the line with a carload of coal or a trainload of wheat or lumber hauled 2,000 or more miles. In America we haul much more raw materials and mining products than in Germany, where more manufactured articles are handled.

Prof. Frank Parsons says:

After studying Government freight rates on the ground and comparing them with American rates for similar distances and shipments, I found that the German per ton-mile rates on local traffic are generally less than one-third of ours.

Local rates in Germany and America compared.

Is it necessary to call a magician, a soothsayer, a wise man to explain why the first four articles above fare so well on the trust-owned railroads of the United States?

RATE COMPARISONS IN ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

England and Germany are similarly situated, and a comparison of rates in those two countries would be a better test of the rates under private ownership and Government ownership under like conditions.

The following appeared in a recent English journal:

It costs $5.72 to transport a ton of hardware from Birmingham to London, while the rate for the same class of goods over the same distance in Germany is about $2.25. Cotton goods from Manchester to London cost, per ton. $8.76; in Germany, the same distance, $4.86 to $5.60. General machinery from Leeds to Hull costs $6.09; in Germany, over precisely the same distance, $1.09 per ton.

I realize that the taking over of these railroads by the Government involves a great deal. It is said that the exchange of securities necessary would so disturb the money market as to create a panic. If we wait for a physical valuation of the roads, that will consume several years, and then we will not have anything definite enough to determine the then value.

I believe we will be compelled to pay for the stock outstanding what that stock is worth, and I would prefer to take over the roads by the acquiring of the stock than in any other way. It is not necessary to acquire a majority of the stock in order to control the railways; it is only necessary to acquire a majority of the voting stock.

In the reorganization of these companies wheels have been created within wheels, corporations within corporations, pools, voting trusts, and every conceivable trick or device to place the control of the original mother corporation within easy grasp of the yachtsmen and the magnates. For instance, it is said that the Rock Island system, capitalized at about $770,000,000, may be controlled, and that it is actually controlled, by the owners of $15,000,000. It is plain that if the Government should acquire this control and announce the policy of hereafter running the Rock Island system for efficiency and for the benefit of the people who "use the road," as President Wilson says the Alaska road must be run, the remaining stockholders would abandon all hopes of speculation with the stocks they own. Of course it would be immaterial what the other stockholders cared to do so long as the Government owned the control and had a free hand.

control and had a free hand.

It is said that "every evil has in itself the germ of its own destruction," so I propose to destroy this private monopoly by taking advantage of its own methods.

WHY UNSCRAMBLE THE EOGS? LET US EAT THEM AS THEY ARE.

It has been asked by the senior Morgan, "Can you unscramble eggs?" The answer I propose is, "We do not want them unscrambled. The American people like scrambled eggs. They will make a splendid breakfast just as they are." I propose to condemn for the Government for public use all stock of all the railroads that has the voting privilege attached to it, which was owned by any other railroad or was in any pool, voting trust, banking house, or in any way pledged to any person or group of persons on January 1, 1914, for the purpose of controlling the policy of any railroad or railroads, and in case the stock in such condition shall not be found sufficient to control the policies of the railroads that in such event as much additional stock possessing the right to vote as may be necessary to vest control be condemned and acquired by the President and turned over to the department of transportation, which will be created. That a secretary of such department be provided. That such secretary be a man of ability such as that displayed by Col. Goethals, for instance. That he proceed at once to reorganize the railroads as a monopoly, and that the policy of absolute complete Government ownership be announced so as to shut off at once all further stock speculation, it being made plain that the Government will buy any outstanding stock at its actual value, but that there will never be any more dividends than 2½ per cent on actual value, the amount of reasonable interest on Government bonds.

I do not want a lot of delay. I would rather get the railroads now, even if we do have to pay something more than they are worth. By stopping the dividends and the most of the interest and the $100-per-plate banquets and the private-car managers and the cutting of melons and the granting of Morganatic commissions and the lieu-land crookedness and extortionate mail contracts we would save for the people $2,000,000 a day. We have the right to level down the big fortunes by income tax and by inheritance tax; so if we pay more for the railroads than they are worth, we can take whatever may be necessary from the abnormally large fortunes to make up for the dif-rerence.

Two millions a day sounds like a tremendous sum, but it is only one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of twenty billions—the railroad capitalization. We have already seen that Brandels has proposed to save $1,000,000 a day by scientific management, without touching the dividends or lessening the interest.

I would authorize the issuance of certificates of ownership for actual cash value of stock to all holders of stock after the Government had acquired the control of the voting stock. These certificates would waive all right to participate in management of the railroads, leaving that to the Government, and the Government would guarantee $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest. Of course, if the stockholders did not want these certificates they could hold their stock till the Government saw fit to condemn it in court.

The total amount of railroad stocks now owned by railway companies in other companies is $3,379,549,704, besides a little over $2,000,000,000 of bonds. The condemnation of these stocks would cause a large sum of money to be paid into the treasury of the Government railway organization and would enable the department to begin at once to bring the roads up to date by purchasing necessary equipment, adopting safety appliances, laying double tracks, and doing all other things necessary to make the roads efficient. Of course these purchases would stimulate business and bury the calamity howlers.

But whatever the plan, Government ownership of railways is inevitable, and the quicker it comes the better it will be for the country.

CONSERVING OF COAL LANDS INDORSED.

We have heard about conservation here on the floor of this House. It has been said that injustices have been perpetrated in the name of conservation in Alaska—a great President has been censured for withdrawing certain lands from entry. I grant that justice in administration has not always prevailed. But the policy of conservation has come to stay, and the people have every reason to rejoice that the coal lands of Alaska were retained. We say we all believe in conservation, but the rub comes when we attempt to define conservation.

The people of this country indorse the action of Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot in preventing the private entry of the coal lands in Alaska and in stopping the robbing of the timber domain of the West. There would not be much sentiment in favor of a Government railroad in Alaska if those faithful public officials had not stayed the hand of the Alaska Syndicate in its almost accomplished efforts to acquire control of some of the principal deposits of coal in Alaska. wanted us to give them the coal. If we had done so, the syndi cate would have built the railroad to their coal mines, and with consideration only of their own needs would have forgotten the slogan "Develop Alaska" for the slogan "Exploit Alaska,"

The railroad policy of Alaska must be thorough; it must be constructive. It must involve the development of the agricultural as well as the mining resources of the country. Alaska will not be passed over to the Guggenheims. It is bad enough to have it temporarily bottled up, with Uncle Sam holding the cork, but it would be infinitely worse to have it permanently bottled up, with the Guggenheims holding the cork.

I am opposed to the leasing of the road. Alaska presents the last opportunity which the United States will have to deliberately adopt a public-land policy for a new country. ever public-land policy is adopted for Alaska will determine the basis of the industrial system for that Territory. So that the United States now has an unusual power in Alaska. If the Government built a railroad and then turned it over to private interests to operate, it would be a policy similar to the landgrant and subsidy schemes of the past.

It may prove profitable for the Government to operate the road to develop the country rather than for immediate profits and traffic. In case, however, the Government leases it to a private concern the lessee would have to pay a rental to the Government and would have to make also a direct and certain profit on operation. This would mean that the users of the road would have to pay rates which would be sufficient to pay a rental to the Government plus a profit to the private operators, on a large capitalization, to men assuming the risk. In short, the people would be forced to pay a transportation tax, first to the United States Treasury and second to the treasury of the private corporation.

In Alaska, particularly, this would work a hardship to men least able to bear it. They should not be asked to contribute any more than necessary to the United States Treasury and still less to the treasury of a private corporation. To build roads in Alaska and lease them to private persons or corporations to operate would be the equivalent of turning over to private interests the operation of the Panama Canal now that we have spent nearly $400,000,000 to construct it.

The following tribute to the worth of Gifford Pinchot is convincing as to the appreciation of President Roosevelt both of the Reclamation Service and of Mr. Pinchot:

ROOSEVELT PAYS HIGH TRIBUTE TO GIFFORD PINCHOT—SAYS HE IS THE MAN TO WHOM THE NATION OWES MOST FOR WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED AS REGARDS THE PRESERVATION OF THE NATURAL RESOURCES OF THE COUNTRY—COLONEL STATES THAT RECLAMATION WAS THE FIRST TASK HE TOOK UP WHEN HE BECAME PRESIDENT.

TASK HE TOOK UP WHEN HE BECAME PRESIDENT.

When governor of New York, as I have already described, I had been in consultation with Gifford Pinchot and F. H. Newell, and had shaped my recommendations about forestry largely in accordance with their suggestions. Like other men who had thought about the national future at all, I had been growing more and more concerned over the destruction of the forests.

While I had lived in the West I had come to realize the vital need of irrigation to the country, and I had been both amused and irritated by the attitude of eastern men who obtained from Congress grants of national money to develop harbors and yet fought the use of the Nation's power to develop harbors and yet fought the use of the Geological Survey, was the first man who fought for irrigation, and he lived to see the reclamation act passed and construction actually begun. Mr. F. H. Newell, the present Director of the Reclamation Service, began his work as an assistant hydraulic engineer under Maj. Powell; and unlike Powell, he appreciated the need of saving the forests and the soil as well as the need of irrigation. Between Powell and Newell came, as Director of the Geological Survey, Charles D. Walcott, who, after the reclamation act was passed, by his force, pertinacity, and tact, succeeded in putting the act into effect in the best possible manner. Senator Francis G. Newlands, of Nevada, fought hard for the cause of reclamation in Congress. He attempted to get his State to act, and when that proved hopeless, to get the Nation to act, and was ably assisted by Mr. G. H. Maxwell, a Californian, who had taken a deep interest in irrigation matters. Dr. W J McGee was one of the leaders in all the later stages of the movement.

GIFFORD PINCHOT, LEADER.

But Gifford Pinchot is the man to whom the Nation owes most for what has been accomplished as regards the preservation of the natural resources of our country. He led, and, indeed, during its most vital period embodied, the fight for the preservation, through use, of our forests. He played one of the leading parts in the effort to make the National Government the chief instrument in developing the irrigation of the arid West. He was the foremost leader in the great struggle to coordinate all our social and governmental forces in the effort to secure the adoption of a rational and far-seeing policy for securing the conservation of all our national resources. He was already in the Government service as head of the Forestry Bureau when I became President; he continued throughout my term not only as head of the Forest Service but as the moving and directing spirit in most of the conservation work, and as counselor and assistant on most of the other work connected with the internal affairs of the country. Taking into account the varied nature of the work he did, its vital importance to the Nation, and the fact that as regards much of it he was practically breaking new ground, and taking into account his tireless energy and activity, his fearlessness, his complete disinterestedness, his single-minded devotion to the interests of the plain people, and his extraordinary efficiency, I believe it is but just to say that among the many, many public officials who under my administration rendered literally invaluable service to the people of the United States, he, on the whole, stood first. A few months after I left the Presidency he was removed from office by President Taft.

RECLAMATION-THE OLD, NARROW VIEWS.

invaluable service to the people of the United States, he, on the whole, stood irst. A few months after I left the Presidency he was removed from office by President Taft.

RECLAMATION—THE OLD, NARROW VIEWS.

The first work I took up when I became President was the work of reclamation. Immediately after I had come to Washington, after the assassination of President McLinley that the house of my sister, Mrs. Cowles, before only the staying at the house of my sister, Mrs. Cowles, before only the staying at the house of Princhot called upon me and faid before not the Bureau of Forestry.

At that time a narrowly legalistic point of view toward natural resources obtained in the departments and controlled the governmental administrative machinery. Through the General Land office and other Government bureaus, the public resources were being handled and dispose of a accordance with the small considerations of petty legal ment, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the head of for the large purposes of constructive development, and the law as a stay of the constructive development, and the law was all that was required.

The relation of the land grabbers. A technical compliance with the letter of the law was all that was required.

The idea that our natural resources were inexhaustible still obtained, and there was as yet no real knowledge of their extent and condition. The relation of the conservation of natural resources to the problems of national welfare and national efficiency had not yet dawned on the public mind. The reclamation of arid public lands in the West was system, with its relational proposes of the conservation of natural resources to t

[Mr. ANSBERRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to take sides with either party to the controversy over Alaska as a field for development. I listened with equal interest to the entrancing stor, told by the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] and to the very sharply contrasting one related by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris]. If even half of what the gentleman from Alaska told us is true, then Alaska is indeed a land of opportunity. And I confess that I am inclined to believe that within a territory so vast there must be riches of one sort or another to invite the adventurous and to stimulate the activities of those looking for fresh fields of enterprise and endeavor. Whether Alaska can ever become self-supporting from an agricultural standpoint is perhaps much less important than the question whether her resources other than agriculture are of such a character as to justify the huge expenditure which is contemplated in the pending bill.

I am inclined to accept the contention of those who stand for development and who assert that with the building of railroads Alaska will rapidly increase in population and in economic importance. For this reason it is my purpose to give the measure my support, although I believe it ought to be amended in a quite vital particular. I am willing to take it for granted that the game is worth the candle: that in building railroads in that for northern clime we shall be contributing in a large way to the sum of wealth. And, taking this for granted, I shall offer an amendment to the bill which I believe will make it acceptable to some who are now violently opposed to it, while it should not alienate a single one of those now its supporters.

As the bill has been reported from committee and as it now stands before the House, a redemption fund is provided into which shall be paid 50 per cent of the proceeds from the sale or disposal of any of the public lands in Alaska or the coal or mineral therein contained or the timber thereon. This is undoubtedly a better proposition from the standpoint of the people than that which prevailed in building the transcontinental railroads 40 or 50 years ago. In the case of the latter we made a present to the railroads of vast areas of land, running into the scores of millions of acres. It was the theory that from the sale of these lands by the grantees money would be derived sufficient to cover the cost of the construction of the railroads, This was a most generous dealing with the private corporations which undertook the work of providing highways between the East and the West. It was enormously profitable for them, yet it can not be said with truth that they showed any considerable appreciation of the favor bestowed, as it took many long years for the people to wring from the railroads a final settlement of what was due from them to the Government.

In the proposition embodied in the pending bill the people are to sell a part, or perhaps all, of the public land in Alaska, the minerals and the timber, for the purpose of reimbursing the Federal Government for the advance which is to be made for the construction of the contemplated railroads, one-half the proceeds of such sales to be so applied. But why the necessity of selling for such a purpose this asset of all the people? If the railroads are to prove a benefit rather than a mistake, their mere building will create values equal to if not far greater than their cost. In the reclamation of arid lands and in the drainage of swamps we have applied a principle which seems to me quite as applicable to the development of Alaska. What I intend proposing to do is not dissimilar from what we do when we bring water to a rainless region; it is not dissimilar from what we do when we cut ditches and dig canals for the drainage of swamps. We have never—or, at least, we have not often—asked the people at large to bear the cost of such improvements. Instead, we almost invariably have said that those who derived the benefits should pay the cost. We have subjected the lands redeemed to a special assessment, this assessment being in proportion to benefits. In other words, we made one hand wash the other, and only those were required to contribute who derived a pecuniary advantage.

I can see no reason why we should not go about the development of Alaska in much the same way. Why should we not take the values which the building of railways in Alaska will undoubtedly create and apply these values to the cost? We have found in practice in the United States that the building of a permanent highway enhances the value of the land adjacent to it in a very handsome way, running from $5 an acre to $25 or higher. This has been so well understood in come States that the cost of building permanent Lighways entirely by a special assessment on the lands affected.

The plan I shall propose will offer no particular encourage ment to the town-lot boomer, to the land-grabber, or to the forestaller of mineral and timber opportunities. It will hold out instead an invitation to the improver, to the man with capital, to the man able and willing to work, to enterprise and industry and thrift. While I believe in conservation, I do not believe in that sort of conservation which locks the door of opportunity and denies admission to nature's laboratory on any terms.

Alaska ought to be wide open to every man who seeks to derelop its resources. For that matter, all the rest of America should be wide open to enterprise and industry, yet much of it is under lock and key. Much that is in use is being put to less than its best use. Within sight of our greatest cities we shall find rich areas producing nothing except suburban town-site booms and advertising signboards. Not half of the land of the country is contributing to the sum of production. It is as tightly locked against labor and enterprise as the land of Alaska under a stupid policy which confesses its impotency to deal with a great problem—the problem of opening opportunity without inviting monopoly.

The plan which I shall propose will open opportunity and at the same time make monopoly of it impossible. Under this plan the very largest encouragement to use would be afforded. Under it the very least encouragement to speculative forestalling would be given. Opportunities would be sought only for use and only for their best use. It would be unprofitable to seize upon mineral or other territory merely for the purpose of holding on in expectation of a rise. For every increment of value due to the growth of population and the development of social activities and enterprise would flow into the Public Treasury rather than into private coffers; and since this fund would meet all public charges, the private property of the individual would remain inviolable and beyond the reach of the taxgatherer.

What I plead for in connection with the opening up and development of Alaska through the construction of railroads is neither new nor strange. The principle is as old as the hills. Nor is the proposed application so novel as it may seem. As I have intimated, it was resorted to in the construction of the land-grant railways, but in a reverse fashion. We first gave the lands away to private corporations, allowing these to enjoy the increment of value due to the growth of population and to apply a part of it to the cost of construction.

Undoubtedly, improved facilities of transportation in Alaska will be accompanied by an inrush of capital and labor; and, undoubtedly, this inrush will be attended by a rapid and widespread enhancement of the value of Alaska land. This enhancement will not be due to any individual effort; it will be due rather to the effort and enterprise and cooperation of all the people of that vast Territory; and so I propose that here is the proper source of revenue, here the reservoir from which the cost of building the iron highways shall be drawn. Mr. Chairman, I may not have made myself clear. But it is hoped that what has been said has been at least suggestive. might have called attention to some of the things which certain cities of Canada have been doing along lines not unlike the one I have ventured to mention. Within a year or two one of the most enterprising of the thriving cities of western Canada has annexed 20 square miles of territory. It was mostly unoccupied land. Into this new territory a network of interurban railway was projected and is building, the cost of this extensive and quite unprecedented improvement being assessed against the lands benefited in proportion to benefits. The results, according to unprejudiced observers, have been remarkable. The owners of the land found that they could no longer afford to have it lie idle.

The burden was too great. They must use their holdings themselves or dispose of them to some one else for use. Nothing less profitable than the vacant-lot industry in Calgary was to be found, and so the vacant-lot industry in that bustling center of enterprise and initiative fell upon evil times and sank into a speedy decay. I might also have referred to some of the experiences of New South Wales in the extension of her railway system, owned by the people, yet sometimes bent to the satisfacsystem, owned by the people, yet sometimes bent to the satisfaction of private greed, but time does not permit. I can only add that the plan I shall propose will apply the acid test to the whole scheme of Alaskan development. If that scheme be sound, if indeed Alaska be the land of promise pictured by the proponents of this measure, if indeed it be the treasure house we are told that it is, the building of railroads will be no mistake, will involve no costly blunder, will prove an investment rather than a profligate waste of public funds; and resulting therefrom will be a growth of values which we ought to take year by year as they accrue for the purpose of extinguishing the debt which we are intending to authorize.

The amendment I shall propose is as follows:

The amendment I shall propose is as follows:

Strike out all of section 4, beginning at line 20, on page 12, and ending with line 8, on page 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 4. That there is hereby created a redemption fund in the United States Treasury to be known as 'the Alaska railway redemption fund,' into which shall be paid the proceeds of an annual tax on the value of the land in Alaska, both publicly and privately owned, which shall be benefited by the construction and the operation of the railroad or railroads herein authorized, this tax to be assessed and collected under regulations made by the Treasury Department and approved by the President, the value of all improvements in or on the land being hereby specifically exempted from taxation as far as 'the Alaska railway redemption fund' is concerned: Provided, That the value attaching to the land of Alaska by reason of improvements other than the construction and operation of the railroad or railroads herein authorized shall not hereby be exempted from taxation for local and general purposes in the Territory of Alaska: Provided further, That into the redemption fund hereinbefore created shall be paid the net earnings of said railroad or railroads above maintenance charges and operating expenses; the said redemption fund, or any part thereof, to be used from time to time upon the order of the President to pay the interest on the bonds authorized and issued under the provisions of this act, and to redeem, cancel, and retire said bonds under such rules and regulations as the President may establish, in accordance with the provisions of this act."

[Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, the people of California and other Pacific Coast States welcome legislation that will make available the vast resources of Alaska. We have for years waited patiently for the announcement of a governmental policy that would result in unlocking that great storehouse for the benefit of all the people of the country. It is not surprising that we have grown restive at the exasperating delays, and our restiveness has increased as we have witnessed year after year the spectacle of foreign ships bringing to our coast coal which had to be transported around Cape Horn while the coal of Alaska, at our very doors, remained untouched.

In our great anxiety to see Alaska developed we have not been unmindful of the necessity of protecting that Territory against exploitation by those who might seek to monopolize its resources, thus depriving the people of the expected benefits. If the policy of delay has resulted in thwarting the designs of those who may have sought to control Alaska's wealth, then there is ample recompense for the seeming procrastination on the part of the Government.

There are no doubt many who will vote for this bill without committing themselves to the policy of Government acquisition of the transportation facilities of the country. They vote for it in the belief that it is probably under all the circumstances the only method that can be agreed upon at this time for the development of Alaska. This is the feeling of many people upon the Pacific coast.

I will frankly state that I vote for the bill with no delusions as to the ultimate cost of the projected road, believing that it will entail expenditures on the part of the Government far exceeding the estimates. I was a Member of this body when we voted for a lock type of canal at Panama, estimated by Government experts to cost $135,000,000, and have seen the cost grow to nearly $400,000,000, but few American citizens can be found who criticize the expenditure, because of the conviction that every dollar was honestly expended.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I do.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman give his estimate of Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman give his estimate of what he thinks it will cost?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I do not dare to give an estimate.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Well, approximately.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I think probably more than double, but believe that every dollar expended by the Government in Alaska, as at Panama, will be honestly expended and result in opening up that great Territory. I listened very attentively last Wednesday to the very able address. Wednesday to the very able address—
Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman just yield for one question there on the line of expenditure?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND, Yes,

Mr. HARDY. Is the gentleman speaking, in his estimate that it will be doubled, as has been stated, just from a general idea that such things generally exceed the estimate, or has the gentleman any reason to believe that this estimate is really under what is reasonable?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I have nothing to guide me but past experience, which has demonstrated that in practically every Government undertaking the cost has far exceeded the original

Mr. HARDY. That has been sometimes the case.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Generally, I think. Mr. HARDY. It has been frequently the case; but in this undertaking is it not possible, and even probable, that the engineers and the estimating people for the Government are capable of being a little more accurate than they were at Panama?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Well, I think in the case of the Panama Canal we had not only one expert, but a board of the most eminent engineers that we could secure, not only in the United States but in Europe,

Mr. HARDY. But was not that also a problem of unknown dimensions?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Not any more unknown, I take it, than the problems facing us in Alaska.

Mr. HARDY. I am rather of the opinion that it was more unknown.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. But, notwithstanding that, I will say I believe the money should be expended and will eventually prove to be a good investment. I have faith that every dollar will be honestly expended. After all, there is not a very great distinction between voting vast land grants, as was the policy in years past, and directly appropriating the money in the first instance.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I have but a few moments, would like to yield, but I must continue,

I listened very attentively last Wednesday to the very able speech of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris]. It was strong speech from the standpoint of those who oppose the bill. I can not resist the temptation, however, of comparing some of the pessimistic predictions of the usually cheerful and optimistic gentleman with those uttered upon the floor of the House 46 years ago when an appropriation of $7,200,000 was made for the purchase of Alaska, this being the amount agreed upon in the treaty of March 30, 1867, negotiated by Secretary Seward on behalf of the United States and by Baron Stoeckl representing the Emperor of all the Russias.

It is somewhat of a coincidence that the gentleman from Oklahoma had a namesake in Congress nearly half a century ago, and when I read the speech of the then Representative from New York, Mr. Ferriss, I was inclined to believe that our friend from the West was a descendant of the former New York Congressman and received his inspiration from this possible ancestor. Comparing their speeches, drawing the deadly parallel, I am constrained to believe that they are of the same kin.

Nearly half a century ago, on July 1, 1868, to be exact, Mr. Ferriss, of New York, on the floor of this House, when the purchase of Alaska was pending, said:

Alaska, with the Aleutian Islands, is an inhospitable, wretched, and God-forsaken region, worth nothing, but a positive injury and encumbrance as a colony of the United States.

That was an 80° below zero speech. But our genial friend bearing the same name, and in the year 1914, was not to be outdone by the early Ferriss statesman. On Wednesday last he gave vent to the following:

They have eight months' darkness in Alaska and the thermometer goes down to 80° below zero. They need firewood more than anything else. * * In the lowlands, where the soil is rich, the frost gets the potatoes, and on the high mucky soil they die for want of fertility.

After reading these two extracts I am tempted to suggest a Ferris coat of arms with some suitable design representing incredulity, pessimism, and lugubriousness. For instance, there might be a heroic figure standing amid snow and ice, bearing in one hand a thermometer registering 80° below zero, representing the Ferris conception of Alaska weather, and in the other hand holding a shriveled-up potato, portraying the family idea of agriculture in the Territory. Underneath I would inscribe, with apologies to Shakespeare, these words: "This is the perpetual winter of our discontent." [Laughter.]

But there were others who did not belong to the family Ferris who apparently emitted pessimism from every pore. Representative Washburn, of Wisconsin, another doubting Thomas, who, addressing the House on July 1, 1868, was extremely skeptical as to the existence of gold in that land of perpetual ice. Listen to what he said:

I defy any living man upon the face of the earth to produce any evidence that an ounce of gold was ever extracted from the Territory of Alaska. * * When I asked him (Representative Banks, of Massachusetts) to show where there was any gold, he read a statement from some Frenchman, 15 years ago, who had never been there, but reasoning from analogy, because there was gold in Siberia. He said there was no doubt gold, silver, diamonds, rubies, amethysts, sapphires, and everything precious on or in the earth would be found in Alaska. But, sir, none of these things has ever been found, and I defy any man in this House or on the face of the earth to produce any testimony that the precious metals have ever been found there.

In the light of the history of the Territory since acquisition, this statement is now interesting. During 1912 alone the Alaska gold output was $17,145,951. The amount of gold produced by Alaska from 1880 to 1913 totals in value over $213,062,471.

Others denied the existence of coal or copper, now known to abound there. Mr. Loan, of Missouri, who had to be shown, like all Missourians, voiced his protest against the purchase, as

That it is an utterly barren waste, wholly incapable of supporting a population of civilized people, is substantially admitted by those who speak most earnestly in favor of its acquisition, and that it is entirely worthless for any useful purpose is not seriously denied.

It is true that we have had most glowing descriptions given us by some who favor this appropriation of the beautiful scenery of Alaska; of the salubrity of its climate; of the productiveness of its soil; of its azure skies and balmy breezes; of its boiling springs and brimstone vapors; of its vast mineral wealth; of its great deposits of coal, iron, and copper; of its mines of cinnabar, silver, and gold, and of the brilliant dlamonds of the largest size and purest water lying around in the utmost profusion; and I acknowledge the pleasure derived from listening to these graphic descriptions drawn from the prolific imaginations of some of our most gifted orators. * * * Why buy Alaska for the sake of its contingent mines, that could, if they exist, only be worked in eternal snow and lee? Alaska is utterly worthless, and if it were otherwise, we have no earthly use for it.

The fish taken from the waters of Alaska since we have owned the Territory up to 1912 amounted in value to $147,953,077; but yet there were those who when the purchase was debated in Congress expressed doubt that the waters abounded with the many varieties now found there. Hon. Hiram Price, of Iowa, was one of those who questioned the fish stories. for on July 1, 1868, an Alaskan field day in the House—a sort of Calendar Wednesday, no doubt-the Iowan became facetious and sarcastic when, referring to Representative Banks's speech of the day before, gave utterance to the following:

There, the gentleman from Massachusetts pointed out to me, the fish with which these waters swarm—no, sir; I beg pardon; not swarm;

there is no room for them to swarm; they are piled up, fish upon fish, pile upon pile, solid columns of fish; no human arithmetic can compute their numbers. And, sir, such fish—shad, salmon, cod—according to the description a foot and over through the shoulders, with sides and tails to match. As I stood there, Mr. Chairman, listening to the gentleman from Massachusetts, with fish to the right of me, fish to the left of me, fish that in front of me, rolling and tumbling, I had to acknowledge that the picture as painted made Alaska a good country—for fish.

To-day we find those on the floor of this House proposing that instead of expending the vast sums necessary to build these roads for the development of Alaska the money be spent within the States, claiming a better return. These men had their prototypes 50 years ago. As far back as that the advocates of Mississippi Bison in the states and the back as the state of Mississippi Bison in the state of the stat of Mississippi River improvement were busy, as they have been ever since and even now are not quiescent, I am told. One of these pioneer Lakes-to-the-Gulf enthusiasts, Congressman Price,

It is far better to expend the $7,200,000 in improving the Mississippl River in order that breadstuffs may be transported cheaply from the West to the seaboard.

I have referred to history to demonstrate that every forward movement, each attempt to take an advanced step, from the time of the formation of this Government has met with strong oppo-In my opinion, in the light of future history, it will be found that the critics of this bill were as much in error as those who 46 years ago voiced their opposition to the purchase of that great Territory to the north, abounding in wealth but as yet undeveloped, a Territory whose possibilities promise much to the entire Nation, and particularly to the Pacific coast. [Ap-

Briefly the pending bill empowers the President of the United States to locate and designate a route or routes for a line or lines of standard-gauge railroad in Alaska, which line or lines shall be so located as to connect one or more of the open Pacific Ocean harbors on the southern coast of Alaska with the navigable waters in the interior of Alaska and with a coal field or fields yielding sufficient for naval base. The bill further provides that the President shall exercise the power of eminent domain in acquiring property for the uses of the said railroad. All the usual duties of a common carrier shall be performed by this railroad at rates subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The issuance of $35,000,000 registered bonds is authorized bearing 3 per cent interest per year. One million dollars is made immediately available to pay the expenses of advertising, preparing, and issuing these bonds, said $1,000,000 to be returned to the Treasury from the first receipts of the sale of the bonds.

The bill also provides a redemption fund to be known as "the Alaska redemption fund," which fund shall consist of 50 per cent of all receipts from the sale of public lands in Alaska, coal or mineral contained therein or timber thereon, and also the net earnings of the railroad or railroads. This fund, subject to the President's order, shall be used to pay the interest on the bonds issued or redeem the bonds themselves.

The purpose of the act is to aid in the development of the agricultural, mineral, and other resources of Alaska and to increase the settlement of public lands in the Territory.

Patiently we have awaited the opening of the Panama Canal, and this dream of years is soon to become a reality. With greater patience, but no less expectantly, have we looked forward to the unlocking of Alaska, and now Congress is about to insert the key and throw open the doors, with Uncle Sam standing on grand to prevent exploitation. Great years are ahead for California and the entire Pacific coast. [Applause.]

I will publish in connection with my remarks extracts from a report made by Mr. Seth Mann, of San Francisco, Cal., personal representative of the President on a tour through Alaska June 21 to July 29, 1913:

There are two primary requirements for the opening up and development of Alaska: First, the construction of railroads, roads, and trails; and, second, the opening up of the coal fields. These two projects should go forward with equal steps, since each is dependent upon the should go forward with equal steps, since each is dependent upon the other.

I am convinced that this work of the building of railroads, as well as the construction of roads and trails, should be carried forward by the Government directly. There is nothing definite or certain in regard to the building of railroads by private enterprise, either unaided or with Government assistance. The traffic to support Alaska railroads must be in large part developed by the road itself, through the settlement of the country induced by increased transportation facilities. When the Bering River and Matanuska coal fields are opened by appropriate legislation railroads to these fields would no doubt be constructed by private enterprise. The opening of these coal fields is, however, a separate problem, and until that problem is satisfactorily solved there will not be sufficient coal traffic to induce the building of railroads to the fields. It may take some considerable time to enact legislation that will result in the satisfactory working of these great deposits. In the meanwhile it must be assumed that railroad development by private enterprise to the coal fields would be delayed until it became apparent that the legislation would result in the immediate opening of the coal that the legislation would result in the immediate opening of the coal measures.

Alaska needs at once one and probably two railroads. One should run from the coast to the Tanana and the Yukon, and the other from the coast in a northwesterly direction at least as far as the valley of the Kuskokwim River. I can not believe that any railroads of this length will be constructed by private enterprise for many years to come. If this be true, such development of that portion of Alaska beyond the Chugach Mountains and as far as the Yukon and the Kuskokwim Rivers must be indefinitely delayed. From the Chugach Mountains to the Yukon River is about 300 miles, and the distance to the Kuskokwim River, in a general westerly direction, is about the same. The country is rich in precious metals and other mineral wealth, which up to the present time have been but slightly developed. The construction of railroads through this country would at once give a sharp impetus to prospectors. The miners and prospectors of Alaska lay great stress upon the difficulties which surround prospecting in this ferritory at any distance beyond 100 miles from the coast or from navigable rivers. With railroad transportation into this country, the prospector could remain in the field, if not twice as long, at least two months longer than he can at the present time. He must enter the field, under present conditions, late in the year, and return again from a month to two months earlier than would be necessary if these railroads were built, since he can not risk the severities of the Alaskan winter, which may prope fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal fatal is also the general opinion that the building of the value and the present of the principal fat trails should be in course of construction at the same time with the railroads.

COAL LANDS.

Two of the most important coal fields in Alaska—the Matanuska and the Bering—lie comparatively near the coast and are readily accessible by railroad line without meeting serious difficulties of construction. Following a policy of intense conservation, these coal fields were withdrawn from location in 1906 and no development of these fields has been made, with the exception of what has been done by the Navy Department in the Bering field and what is now being done by the same department in the Matanuska field. An investigation is being made to ascertain whether this coal can be used effectively by the Navy. Coal has been brought to the coast at great expense for these experimental purposes. The high character of the coal from both of these fields, much of it approaching anthracite in quality, is vouched for by many reports from the geological department of the Government.

The instant question concerns the character of legislation which should be enacted in order to open these coal fields to development. The generally expressed opinion in Alaska is that it matters little how these coal fields are opened, so long as they are opened. The more thoughtful opinion is expressed by drawing a distinction between conservation and reservation. And it is claimed that these coal fields have not been conserved but reserved. Conservation, but not reservation, is the cry. It is generally conceded that the monopolization of these coal fields in the hands of a very few great operators would inevitably result if the fields were opened to location and alienation. One method of preventing this is to provide for the leasing of these coal lands by the Government with conditions against the assignment of the leases and requiring active prosecution of the work of coal mining under them. The Government would thus retain control of the coal fields and could prevent their monopolization. The opinion is expressed by a number of Alaskans that these

I will also print as part of my remarks the following telegram: SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., January 24, 1914.

Hon. J. R. Knowland, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, representing every substantial business and commercial interest thereon, views with gratification the relief which Congress is about to give the Territory of Alaska in the shape of legislation permitting of the development of its resources, a development which is vital and of tremendous importance to the commercial welfare of the entire Pacific coast. This organization urges you to exert your utmost influence to unlock the vast wealth of that Territory by the support of a program which will insure transportation facilities, and without which no material development can take place. We believe that this is a moral obligation fairly resting upon the Government, in view of its previous attitude to that Territory.

ASSOCIATED CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]

is recognized.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would not think of trespassing upon the good nature of the committee at this time were it not for the fact that possibly I will not be able to be present when the bill comes up for discussion the next time, and I wanted to say just a word relative to my position upon it before it is finally disposed of.

This bill should be considered entirely on its own merits and separate and apart from the larger and more general question of governmental ownership of all railroads, a question not involved in this bill.

I had the pleasure of serving in the last Congress upon the Committee on the Territories. During that time the committee gave a good deal of attention to legislation touching Alaska. Extensive hearings were held relative to the railroad proposi-And I understand that the committee in this Congress has given the matter still further consideration. I know that extensive hearings have been held and the subject thoroughly investigated. I simply want to state, Mr. Chairman, that from the information I have been able to collect, starting upon a theory which was not inclined to be favorable to the idea of governmental ownership of railroads—and I am not now inclined to subscribe to the theory as applicable to the country as a whole standing upon the theory that the ownership and operation of the railroads of the whole country was not a necessary function of the Government at this time, yet from what information I have been able to collect and what facts I have been able to gather concerning Alaska, I am firmly of the opinion that this bill now under consideration, which undertakes to provide for the construction of railroads in Alaska, ought to pass, with certain amendments, and if I am here when the vote is taken I shall vote for it. [Applause.] I shall vote for it, providing there can be an amendment to the bill. I should not want to vote for the bill in its present form. On page 10 I find the following language, enumerating the powers that the President is to have under this proposed law. It says he shall have the power-

To lease the said railroad or railroads after completion upon such terms as he may deem proper, but no lease shall be for a longer period than 10 years, or, in the event of failure to lease, to operate the same until the further action of Congress.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly, Mr. BRYAN. Is not the gentleman mistaken when he says the bill says he shall have the power to lease? Does not the bill say that he is authorized, empowered, and directed?

Mr. WILLIS. I was about to explain that a little bit further. I think the gentleman is correct in his quotation. In other words, as I understand this clause, after we have gone ahead and built this railroad at an expense of $35,000,000, the Government is not to be authorized to operate that railroad unless it is unable to lease it.

Now, my position is that if we are to build a railroad I am utterly and absolutely opposed, after we have built it and paid for it, to leasing it to anybody. [Applause.] I believe the Government should build this railroad and own it and operate it. That is my theory on this matter, and consequently I hope that the amendment that I have referred to will be adopted, which will strike from the bill this clause which practically requires the President of the United States to lease the road after it shall have been constructed.

Mr. Chairman, I think that there are only two possible ways in which we can open up Alaska. In the first place, there are two different ways in which we may look at this We may say that Alaska ought to be held here undeveloped, its resources untouched, a sort of great storehouse for future generations. The other theory is that we ought to take the immense resources of Alaska and develop them now for the use of the present generation. I am frank to say that it seems to me unwise and undesirable to leave that great empire of untold wealth practically untouched; to leave it there slumbering and awaiting development at the hand of future generations. In other words, I believe that this Congress ought to take some action now that will make it possible to develop Alaska.

Now, then, it is admitted by all those who are at all acquainted with the situation there that it is utterly impossible to develop Alaska without some means of transportation. Personally, I am of the opinion that it will not be necessary at once to go as far in the construction of railway lines as has been contemplated in this discussion. I think that if the Government will build one railroad reaching from tidewater, say at Seward or Valdez, across somewhere to the great interior valleys—to Fairbanks, for example—that will be sufficient for the present, and this could be done for half the amount provided by this bill. But, however that may be, it is quite apparent that we can not develop Alaska without the construction of a railroad.

Now, if we are to construct railroads, shall we do that by means of subsidies or land grants or directly by the agency of the Government? I am of the opinion that this Government has had sufficient experience in the building of railroads by means of land grants. By that method we pay for the railroad, and then it belongs to somebody else. criticizing the policy that formerly obtained. Perhaps it was a wise policy so far as the transcontinental railroads are concerned. But it seems to me that now the only proper step to take is to pass this bill, amended as I have indicated, and build a railroad in Alaska and develop the great untouched resources of that mighty empire. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, what I shall say will be an unprepared discussion of this matter. But a few days ago I listened to the full-length discussion of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] with great interest, and with the belief, when he was through, that he had spoken the strongest word against the passage of this bill. And yet when he concluded there was this peculiar situation presented by the first part and by the last part of his speech: In the first part of it he succeeded in proving, if you admitted all his statements of fact, that there were no resources in Alaska worth developing, and that therefore the expenditure on the part of the Government of $35,000,000, if made, would be thrown to the winds or into the sea. Then he wound up by proving, if you took his conclusions as correct, that if the Government would only adopt a proper system of leasing, so as to prevent monopolization, the wealth of Alaska was such that private enterprise would go in and develop it by the building of a railroad.

Now, those were the two contradictory positions which he undertook to sustain, and it just is not humanly logically possible to do it. His remedy and solution of the Alsakan problem was to provide an adequate and a properly restricted system of leasing. That, in his opinion, was the only thing proper to be done, the only thing necessary to do. So far as a proper system of leasing is concerned I thoroughly agree with him as to its desirability, but even he did not attempt to define what kind of a system that might be. Then he took up another question that appeals with peculiar force to many Democrats, and especially to southern Democrats, and that was the question of Government ownership of railroads. With some people it is like shaking a red rag in front of a bull to talk of the Government owning anything but a courthouse and a jail. The fact is, we now own the resources in Alaska. Ninety-five per cent of what is there belongs to the United States Government. If we convert some of it into a railroad, we do not increase the holdings, the ownings of the Government, except that by building the railroads we increase the value of every resource there is in Alaska. It would be commendable and wise for a private owner to develop his inaccessible property by making it accessible and multiplying its value and usefulness manyfold, but in the eyes of the gentleman from Oklahoma and of some others it would be a horrible thing for the Government to do this.

I believe it is true that private capitalists would build those roads if they were given half or much less than half the resources of the country. They would build the roads if you would do as you did when the transcontinental roads were built in continental United States. If you would give them a throttle hold upon the resources of that Territory, they would build the railroads there. They are not so skeptical as the gen-tleman from Oklahoma. They know the country is rich. They know it is worth developing, and if you let them develop it under their sole supervision and domination they will open up her mines, they will take out her coal, they will build her railroads, they will connect them with ship lines, they will transport coal to every part of the United States, and they will even perhaps reduce the price of coal below what we have to pay now for that common necessity coming now mainly from Virginia and Pennsylvania fields. I do not say positively they will reduce the price of coal; that depends on whether they can get control of both sources of supply.

If by some means we can open up a new supply of coal, we shall reduce the price to the consumer, even though we have to give this second source of supply to another combination of capitalists. This reduction of price will at least hold till the combination embraces both sources of supply. If the combina-tion has control of the transportation in Alaska, independent production there will be impossible. But if we can avoid the monopoly and open up that country under a proper system of leases, with freight rates fixed by the reasonable charges of a Government road that will not use the power of monopoly to rob and oppress the people, will you not surely increase the sup-ply of coal and decrease its cost to the consumer? But that is not all

Mr. DAVENPORT. I want to ask the gentleman if he will vield for a question.

Mr. HARDY. I have very little time; but if the House will be patient, I will yield.
Mr. DAVENPORT. What would the gentleman's position be Mr. DAVENPORT. What would the gentleman's position be on the proposition of constructing a railroad into Alaska, but leaving the more than 1,200 miles of waterways to be controlled by privately owned ships? Will the gentleman vote for the Government construction of a steamship line to run from Seattle. Wash., to Alaska?

Mr. HARDY. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries has before it to-day the investigation of the ship combine, which is perhaps the biggest question that the commerce of this world has ever encountered. What we may do in order to untie our hands, unshackle our ankles, and take the yoke from our necks in order that we may not be dominated by an absolute combination of all the ships on the sea, I do not know. That is a great problem for the future. Let us solve these problems one at a time, and let us not give over the mineral treasures of Alaska to what is fast becoming a world-wide transportation combination.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Will the gentleman vote for that propo-tion—for a line of Government-owned ships?

Mr. HARDY. Not under present conditions. If we had this road built by the Government and were trying under proper lease laws to develop Alaska's coal and copper and gold, and shipowners should begin to rob us by charging unreasonable rates, then I would say "yes," because if it comes to a question of whether the Government shall control its carrying facilities or the transportation companies shall control the Government, I am in favor of the former proposition, even though we have to ewn railroads and ships to do it; and I am no railroadownership man, either, though I do not fear it as some of my friends do. The gentleman forgets that in building the Panama Canal the Government bought and used some great freight and passenger ships rather than submit to extortionate prices by our patriotic private-ownership ship lines; and we saved millions by buying these ships, which we still own. But let us see what this whole question is, in calm, cool discussion. We have Alaska. They tell us the population has not increased there. They make this as an argument against this bill.

It is a wonder to me that the population has not decreased, when Irish potatoes, the cheapest bread a man can get there, cost a dollar a pound, according to the gentleman from Okla-Mr. FERRIS talks of developing Alaska under proper How can a man, under any leasing system, take out lease laws. coal and sell it at any price and make enough to pay a dollar a pound for bread or potatoes to live on? That is the result of the transportation system you have there now. That is the condition under which the population has not increased.

As a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I had a little experience connected with Alaska. Somebody introduced a bill to authorize an American citizen to buy a ship-an ice breaker-to traverse the waters in those cold seas, and bring a little cheaper freight rates to the people of Fairbanks and the interior. The ship in question was foreign built. We had no American-built ship suited for the serv-That proposition was fought by another selfish interest. The patriotic American shipbuilders fought it and killed it. did not want these people, who were cut off from the world six months in the year, to have an opportunity, by means of an ice-breaking vessel, to world if they had not built the ship.

TOUNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for Mr. HARDY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In regard to the steamship matter—the question asked by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Davenport]-I want to suggest that the people of my locality-Grays Harbor, Wash.-want to build a steamship to run to Alaska. We have extensive shipyards in that lumber country on the north Pacific coast, and I have a letter in my hand in which they say that if railroad transportation is opened in Alaska, so that all the people can benefit from that railroad, the people of Grays Harbor, Wash., will build ships and man them and put them into the trade.

Mr. HARDY. That will answer the question of the gentleman from Oklahoma, provided the shipping combine will let that ship live. Whether they will do that or not I do not wish to discuss at this time. But let me proceed with my statement.

The gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Alaska both show that freight rates are to-day high in that country, being absolutely dominated by a combination of railway companies; that every piece of machinery that may be sent into it for the purpose of developing it costs such rates that none except the syndicate can afford to ship machinery there.

The gentleman from Oklahoma shows that bread costs such prices that the country can not be populated. While we have a country there that might have been greatly developed in the 40 years we have owned it, and might now have had a population of 300,000, and perhaps double that, we only, in fact, have a little measly population of thirty-odd thousand.

There are three ways of looking at this question in relation to Alaska. We may leave it for our children to say when the doors shall be opened, confessing thereby our inability to handle the question. Another way is to do as we have done in developing other parts of our country in the past-give it over to a private monopoly, the Guggenheims and the Morgans and that class, saying to them, "Enter thou in our stead into this new kingdom of ours; own, dominate, and control it until the children of the present generation, the future inhabitants of Alaska, shall break their chains by repudiating the legislation under which you went into possession." The third way is for the Government of the United States to say, since there is no other solution to the question, we will cut the Gordian knot, we will build the road, knowing full well that its cost will be repaid manyfold by returns from leasing or selling the property that will be developed, and then your children and my children will live to see another Norway and Sweden in this country, full of people and industries, and a thriving, God-serving, American citizenship.

Why, if we wanted an example, Old-World Russia gives it to us. She saw stretching across the far Siberian plain a great country, cold as it was, on the steppes of Asia, where wheat might grow and other agricultural products, and a great people live and prosper, but that country could not develop without transportation facilities.

It had been a place of exile for criminals. Russia neither confessed her impotency nor gave away her rich domain to private monopoly. Russia concluded that she would build a great rail-way across that land, which the pessimists of this Congress would have declared not worth developing. Russia herself was timid. She started out, as I remember, with a single line of railway. Even this she justified to her people largely as a military necessity. She hoped she might find freight for this single line in products of the country. She hardly completed the first building before she had to build again. She had to double her tracks, and to-day in the Siberian steppes there is the greatest wheat field of the world. I believe when the Government builds this one road little towns will spring up around the railway stations and the mining camps. People will go there and dig the coal, the copper, and gold and redeem little by little the land in the vicinity of each settlement, throw it into truck patches, gardens, and small fields, and in the end they will develop no small agricultural resources. In not many generations we will have there a horde of industrious, intelligent, frugal, deserving citizens of the United States.

It may not be for a long time that it will equal the present population of Sweden and Norway. It may not be that you and I will live long enough to see that, but our children will.

I believe the evidence shows the mineral wealth of Alaska unsurpassed by any part of North America. Her coal is inexhaustible, her copper fields immense, and her gold mines per-haps equal South Africa. When these gold mines are made accessible they will probably give us a product greater than California did and the supply of basic money will be increased. There will be no chance for a contraction of the currency on the diminished supply of gold. The building of this road will in every way help the commerce and the general broad prosperity of this country, and am I, forsooth, simply because I am opposed to Government ownership of railroads, obliged to vote against this great beneficence to the whole American [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRISON reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 1739, the Alaskan railway bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, by unanimous consent and by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915 (H. Rept. 199), which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HART, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James Dodds, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, some time ago the House disagreed to Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 32 and asked for a conference. On yesterday the Senate agreed to the conference. This is a bill providing for an additional district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. One of the conferees appointed under the House action was the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Webb], who is now necessarily absent in Georgia taking testimony in the case of Judge Speer, against whom charges have been preferred.

I therefore ask that some one else be substituted for Mr. Webb, so that the conferees may have a session with the Senate conferees

The SPEAKER. This being Calendar Wednesday, it will take unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the request would take unanimous consent at any time, but no one has any objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a perfect right to appoint another conferee without asking anyone's consent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it requires a message to the Senate. It requires action by the House. If the House changes the conferees, that fact must be messaged to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair looked that up yesterday, and he is absolutely certain he could do it; but it does not matter, because the gentleman is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, is there anything in disagreement except that provision that the President shall make public the indorsements of the appointee?

Mr. CLAYTON. Nothing in disagreement, except that the President shall make known the indorsers of the appointee under this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be agreed to and that the bill be passed.

Mr. MANN. Why, we have instructions of the House that the Senate amendment shall not be agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman object? Mr. MANN. In the absence of my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. Cullop] I certainly would not want to take advantage of him at this time of the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

I object. Mr. MANN.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. CARLIN, as conferee in the place of Mr. WEBB.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE SESSIONS.

Mr. CLAYTON, Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 392.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection,
The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE SENATOR SHELBY M. CULLOM.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 29, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, this day is Thine, in Thy hands. This great Nation is Thine, led out into national life, as we believe, according to some great divine purpose. Thou hast surely had Thy hand upon us for good. Thou dost lead us on to the accomplishment of some wise and blessed design. While we can know but little of Thee, we can not doubt that Thou art mindful of us and that Thou art a rewarder of them that diligently seek Thee. We come to commit ourselves into Thy hands, and pray that more and more we may recognize Thy right to rule in all that we have to do as a Nation.

We remember to-day, our Father, with sad hearts the passing away of one illustrious in life, who in the strength of his manhood was called into leadership of our national life, and for many years a Member of this distinguished body. We thank God for enabling him to pitch his life upon so high a plane and for all of his ministry and influence among us as a Nation. As Thou dost call such men—great and wise and true—into that vast beyond, we pray Thee to lay Thy hand upon others that our Nation may yet press on for the accomplishment of the divine plan and purpose in us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

> AGRICULTURAL CREDIT. PART I .- Introduction.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1914.

To the Congress:

To the Congress:

The last paragraph of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, appreved March 4, 1913, authorized the creation of the United States Commission and defined its duties as follows:

"That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission composed of not more than seven persons, who shall serve without compensation, to cooperate with the American Commission assembled under the auspices of the Southern Commercial Congress to investigate and study in European countries cooperative land-mortgage banks, cooperative rural-credit unions, and similar organizations and institutions devoting their attention to the promotion of agriculture and the betterment of rural conditions; and for the purpose of its investigations the commission shall be authorized to incur and have paid, upon the certificate of its chairman, such expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere for the payment of the salaries of employees, clerks, stenographers, assistants, and such other necessary expenses as the commission may deem necessary: Provided, That the total expenses incurred for all purposes shall not exceed the sum of $25,000; and the sala commission shall submit a report to Congress as early as practicable embodying the results of its investigations and such recommendations as it may see fit to make."

purposes shall not exceed the sum of $23,000; and the said commission shall submit a report to Congress as early as practicable embodying the results of its investigations and such recommendations as it may see fit to make."

In pursuance of the authority conferred on him by this act, President Wilson named as the members of this commission:
United States Senator Duncan U. Fletcher, of Florida.
United States Senator Thomas P. Gore, of Oklahoma.
Col. Harvie Jordan, planter, of Atlanta, Ga.
Br. John Lee Coulter, agricultural expert of the Census Bureau, Washington, D. C.
Dr. Kenyon L. Butterfield, president of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, Amherst, Mass.
Dr. Clarence J. Owens, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress, Washington, D. C.
The members perfected an organization with Senator Duncan U. Fletcher as chairman and Congressman Ralph W. Moss to act as chairman in his absence, and with Dr. John Lee Coulter as secretary.
Complying with the letter of the act, which instructed the commission "to cooperate with the American Commission," five of the members, together with a small clerical staff, sailed for Europe April 26 in company with the members of the American Commission.

While in Europe one or more of the members visited Italy, Hungary, Austria, Russia, Germany, Demmark, Belglum, Holland, France, England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland.

Engagements were made to consult the leading authorities in each country; and through interviews with all classes—leading authorities, farmers, officers and employees of institutions—reports submitted, and visits to institutions, all types of "land-mortgage banks, cooperative rural-credit unions, and similar organizations, and institutions devoting their attention to the promotion of agriculture and the betterment of rural conditions, and similar organizations, and institutions devoting their attention to the promotion of agriculture and the betterment of commerce, but also by representatives of the Governments in the countries visited and by private cit

States which should and must affect any proposed system of agricultural reform.

Owing to the limited time at its disposal and to the limited appropriation, this commission has devoted its investigation to the question of agricultural credit and to recommending a plan for reform in the methods of financing farmers and farm operations in the United States. Various phases of agricultural reform, including cooperative purchasing, cooperative production and marketing of farm products, and a study of rural conditions have been covered to some extent by this commission and by the American commission, and much of the information secured during the investigation into these matters is reproduced in the public document above referred to as Senate Document No. 214. This commission, however, has confined its report to a consideration of rural credit, to suggestions looking toward the creation of an adequate system of agricultural banks, and to an extension of the facilities offered by existing financial institutions, so as to meet the pressing needs of our farming population.

Agricultural credit naturally divided itself into two great classes, namely, long-term or land-mortgage credit, which may be briefly defined as "credit to meet the capital requirements of the farmer," and short-term or personal credit, which may be defined as "credit to meet the current or annually recurring needs of the farmer." In the European system of agricultural banks the distinction between these two classes of credit is sharply drawn. To meet the requirements of the two classes of organization and operation. These different institutions, however, naturally fouch at many points. They have grown up by a slow process and have been adapted and adjusted to meet conditions as they arose. They still preserve their separate identity, and their operations are largely confined to their separate fields. Whether the conditions in our country demand a segregation of institutions designed to meet both needs, has been a matter of serious consideration and s furnishing long-term, or land-mortgage, as well as short-term, or personal, credit for farmers is also necessary as a preliminary to reaching any decision on this point.

In considering this question the commission has attempted to define, in the first place, the needs of the American farming population in a financial sense. As noted above, a careful consideration of this point has resulted in its defining these needs as being two in number, as follows:

First. The farmer's capital requirements, by which is meant the follows:

First. The farmer's capital requirements, by which is meant the need of the farmer for large sums of money to be used in aiding to pay the purchase price of the farm, in improving his farm, such as erecting new farm buildings, draining, irrigating, or clearing, or in equipping the farm so as to bring his operations to the highest state of efficiency.

The money needed for these purposes must be in the shape of a more or less permanent investment, or in the shape of loans extending over such a long period of time that they can be gradually reduced and paid off out of the increased carnings derived from the improvements made or the equipment added by the farmer with the proceeds of such loans. This is generally referred to as long-term or land-mortgage credit.

and paid off out of the increased carnings derived from the improvements made or the equipment added by the farmer with the proceeds of such loans. This is generally referred to as long-term or land-mortgage credit.

Second. The farmer's temporary or annually recurring requirements, by which is meant the money needed by him to finance his operations during the time that the crops are being produced. These temporary requirements recur every year and embrace the financial needs of the farmer for the purpose of preparing the land, sowing and cultivating the crops, and harvesting the same. This is generally referred to as personal or short-term credit. But the short-term credit of the farmer should be distinguished from the short-term credit of the merchant or manufacturer. The merchant requires banking accommodation for 30, 60, or 90 days, during which period he can dispose of the stock acquired and repay the loan; in confrast, the farmer may require short-term credit extending from the time the crops are planted until they are harvested, and this may be fixed approximately at from 90 days to 1 year. After the crops are harvested and stored in a barn, elevator, or warehouse, the need of agricultural banking is largely removed, as the financial handling of the crops so stored then comes under the province of commercial banking. The questions, therefore, to be considered resolve themselves.

The questions, therefore, to be considered resolve themselves in the methods of furnishing for the farmer long-term or land-mortgage credit and short-term or personal credit. For convenience in discussing these two systems of credit, long-term or land-mortgage credit will be hereafter referred to as mortgage credit must necessarily be based on the security of the land owned by the farmer and because such mortgage credit must for convenience be again subdivided into long-term mortgage credit and short-term mortgage credit.

In the opinion of this commission these two general classes of credit must be largely segregated, although sonal credit.

In the opinion of this commission these two general classes of credit must be largely segregated, although the two systems will naturally touch at many points. Further, in the judgment of this commission, the development of a system of farm-land banks is the most important and the primary step to be taken in order to improve our agricultural-credit conditions. It naturally and necessarily precedes the development of personal credit. The history of European systems has shown that the land-mertgage banks preceded the personal-credit banks. In this country it is urgently necessary to create a land-mortgage security which will be entirely liquid by reason of having a ready market, which will run for a long time, which can be paid off in small annual or semi-annual installments, and which will enable the land-owning farmer to use most advantageously his best banking asset, land, as the basis of credit.

annual installments, and which will enable the land-owning farmer to use most advantageously his best banking asset, land, as the basis of credit.

In this part of the report the problems of mortgage credit will be first considered, since definite recommendations have already been carefully prepared suggesting important national legislation. The problems of personal credit will follow in a separate section of the report to be submitted at an early date.

In discussing the bearing of the experience of the European countries upon this question, special reference may be made to Germany as an illustration, since both systems of credit have attained very great efficiency in that Empire and remarkable results to the farmer have been secured, doubtless to a large extent as a result of the growth of agricultural credit. If space permitted, this comparison could be extended to other countries which were visited by the commission to good advantage, but probably additional and extended comparisons would make this report too voluminous.

In considering the conditions in Germany, as applying to the conditions in the United States, the essential points of difference between the two countries should always be borne in mind. In size the German Empire is about equal to the area of the State of Texas after cutting off from Texas an area as large as the State of Alabama. In population the German Empire contains about 68,000,000 people, or more than two-thirds of the population of the whole United States. In intensive farming the Germans are far ahead of our own farming population, and the average production in Germany has increased greatly, while our average yield per acre has increased but slowly. In Germany the population in a given district is largely homogeneous, and the individual is, so to speak, attached to the soil, the same farms continuing in the same families for generations. In this country such a condition is seldom found. In Germany, on account of the known productivity of each piece of land, the value of that land PART II .- Land-mortgage or long-term credit.

DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS.

Mortgage credit, organized into a special system of banking, has existed in Europe since the reign of Frederick the Great. Beginning in Prussia, this system of banking has grown until mortgage institutions have been organized under authority of law in practically even European State. Neither in method of organization nor in detail of operation does there exist uniformity in type. The banks of one country doing precisely the same character of business may differ widely from those of another country, and it is possible to find divergent types in successful operation under the laws of the same country. Agricultural conditions do not vary more widely in the different States in our country than do conditions in the several States and Provinces in Europe where these banks have been successfully operated over long periods of time. Therefore, a careful study of European experience with mortgage banks forces the conviction that the basic principles of mortgage banks are well adapted to meet the necessities of American agriculture. It is a question of wisely applying well-established principles rather than of copying methods of organization. organization.

Cand-mortgage bonds: One general principle which underlies all mortgage banks of Europe is the issue of bonds which are based on the collective value or security of many individual mortgages on real estate. It is the merging of the credit demands and the property resources of many individuals, somewhat similarly situated, into one financial transaction. States, municipalities, counties, and other organized communities in the United States have adopted this principle. Public improvements of all kinds are commonly constructed from the proceeds of bonds issued against the total taxable wealth of a political division and are sold in the open markets. These bonds are justly popular and have made possible the construction of many mighty works of civilization.

Similarly, one of the chief advantages which corporate laws have Public improvements of all kinds are commonly constructed from the proceeds of bonds issued against the total taxable wealth of a political division and are sold in the open markets. These bonds are justly popular and have made possible the construction of many mighty works of civilization.

Similarly, one of the chief advantages which corporate laws have conferred is the cheap credit which the concentration of resources has made possible. For this reason, principale organization have made marvelous growth during the past few decades in the United States.

Hut agriculture is best adapted to individual ownership and management. The laws making possible cheap credit to political communities and to corporations have been of no advantage to agriculture. It is not singular that agriculture should languish in comparison with the store of these other itend the scope of these laws so as to meet the business requirements of farmers whose calling prevents them from adouting corporate methods of transacting business.

Short-term and long-term mortgages and amortization: Mortgage credit is generally divided into short and long term loans. This distinction is based upon the duration of the loan and also upon the method of repaying the principal sum. Short-term loans. This distinction for repaying the principal sum. Short-term loans, the principal being repayable at the maturity of the loan. All loans exceeding five years are classified as long-term loans, the principal sum being repayable in small annual or semiannual payments. The latter method of repayment is technically known as "amortization," The issue of land-mortgage bonds and the method of amortization payments. The latter flow of the principal and the bank scharges thirty-flow one-tundrediths of 1 per cent for administration, then an amortization are the distinctive features of Europa system loans, the principal sum being at pay and the bank charges thirty-flow one-hundredths of 1 per cent for administration, then an amortization. If the prace of the borrower is de rate on money.

Tax exemptions: To place these collective farm loans at as low a rate of interest as the community is able to secure, the securities must be freed from taxation. This principle has been recognized generally in all legislation authorizing the issuing of bonds based on the taxing power. Both in Federal and in State borrowing such bonds are generally freed from taxation. In the matter of real-estate mortgages, however, this principle is not so generally recognized. In some States mortgages are freed from taxation if the money is loaned at a rate not higher than that specified by the act granting immunity from taxation. In other States only a certain sum is relieved from taxation. In each of these exemptions, the State recognizes that a low rate of interest on mortgages is in the interest of the general welfare.

low rate of interest on mortgages is in the interest of the general welfare.

It can not be denied that taxation by a State of the mortgage and of the real estate on which the mortgage is predicated is double taxation. A farmer can not with safety go in debt for 60 per cent of the value of improved real estate and pay taxes on both the land and the mortgage. President Taft, in his letter to the governors of our States, asserted that farmers are paying higher interest rates than any other class of business men. It can be asserted with entire confidence that they are also paying a higher taxation in proportion to their property holdings than any other class of citizens. In the Middle West, where land values range from $100 upward per arcre, if the land be mortgaged for 50 per cent of its value, and if the mortgage is taxed, the debtor owner is investing $50 per acre and paying interest on $50 per acre. He is also paying directly the tax on the land and paying indirectly the tax on the mortgage. Under these conditions—rising land values and cumulative taxation—the land is slowly but surely passing away from resident ownership to landlord ownership. Farm tenancy is undenibly on the increase.

cumulative taxation—the land is slowly but surely passing away from resident ownership to landlord ownership. Farm tenancy is undenlably on the increase.

Without a modification of our taxation laws, however, the substitution of the European system of land mortgage will materially increase the possibilities of taxing fictitious values. Under that system the lender and the borrower have no direct relation with each other. The lender creditor does not receive the obligation of the borrower debtor, who issues his obligation—the mortgage—to a bank, and this bank in turn issues a second obligation—the collateral trust bond or land-mortgage bond—to the real creditor, the man who invests his money. If all these values are taxed—the land, the mortgage, and the bond—we will have increased the burden of taxation, which, under present conditions, rests so heavily on the owners of mortgaged real estate.

One of the leading purposes of a rational system of mortgage credits is to enable any honest, industrious agricultural laborer or tenant to acquire, by a part payment of the purchase price, immediate control and ultimate ownership of a tract of land, and thereby check the growing evil of tenancy. At the same time the system should enable any owner of agricultural real estate to secure capital on terms which will enable him to improve his holding and to render his land more productive. In either instance, the terms must be such as 40 prevent temporary crop failure from driving the owner from his farm and from causing the loss of all savings. These are worthy purposes, and they will promote in the largest and best sense the general welfare of our Republic. These ends can not be attained in the highest degree except by a recognition of their public character and a remission of taxation on the paper values which are created, in order to encourage the acquisition of farms by their operators and also the improvement of farm properties. The public retains all real values of property for taxation purposes, and these real values wi or farms by their operators and also the improvement of farm properties. The public retains all real values of property for taxation purposes, and these real values will be largely enhanced by the investment of large sums of capital which will be attracted to the farms under such legislation.

Land titles, exemptions, and foreclosures: The titles to land, exemptions from execution, and legal processes for foreclosure in default of payment are important considerations in the operation of any system at the control of the control of the payment are important considerations. In the operation of any system at the control of the process of foreclosure. Moreover, these banks usually grant special process of foreclosure. Moreover, these banks usually grant special process of foreclosure. Moreover, these banks usually grant special process of foreclosure. Moreover, these banks usually grant special process of foreclosure. In the principal in small semiannual amounts; but if he neglects or refuses to keep his contracts as to these payments, then he must speedily forfeit his property. There are no long, expensive processes of foreclosure. But in the disposal of property by auction under foreclosure proceedings the creditor takes only the amount of his debt plus foreclosure expenses, the balance of the proceeds of sale being returned to the debtor as his right.

Under our form of government these important matters are under State source of the severelegarity and are subject to State legislation. Every student of State guarantee of title, as, for instance should adopt some system, against the best interest of the general public to have possible legal disputes over the ownership of land. The loss incident to such uncertainty falls primarily on the landowner, but in the end this loss is transferred to the general public, because the food and shelter of the Nation is secured from the soil. It is a recognition of this economic fact which justifies and sustains wise legislation to promote the best interest of agriculture. Europe this volume to 15 times their resources, which would seem to be a better ratio. At this proportion, banks reported to this commission that they were declaring annual dividends at from 12 per cent to 14 per cent, so that no just complaint can be made on the basis of earnper cent, s

The capital and surplus of the mortgage bank should not be entirely invested in long-term mortgage loans, but should be invested in other securities. The resources of the bank may very properly be advanced in loans for short periods, pending an issue of its collateral trust bonds, or they might be temporarily invested in its own securities. The full success of a mortgage bank can not be assured unless a market is always present for its bonds. The desirability of a security, from an investment standpoint, does not depend wholly on the rate of income; the question of a ready cash market at a fixed value—its convertibility into cash at the will of the holder—is an important feature of an investment. The land-mortgage bond is an invention to render liquid the value of real estate; and, therefore, the bank which issues these collateral trust bonds should be prepared to repurchase them when they are offered on the market. Much of the capital of the bank should be available for this purpose and should not be tied up in long-time loans.

when they are offered on the market. Much of the capital of the bank should be available for this purpose and should not be tied up in long-time loans.

From its nature, mortgage business is distinct from commercial banking. In mortgage banks the money to be loaned is derived from the sale of bonds, and the capital of the bank is to be largely invested in interest-bearing securities. Short-time personal loan business should be avoided or minimized, deposits should be restricted, either in amount or kind. Yet experience has demonstrated that mortgage banks should accept a limited volume of such business. The nature of their business dealings with their clients lead the latter to desire to leave money in their care for short periods and for special purposes. The bank should collect bills, drafts, and other similar paper. Thus, for the convenience of its clients, mortgage banks should be permitted to receive deposits of money, but careful restrictions along this line are desirable.

Type of institution: There can well be honest difference of opinion as to the style of corporation which is best adapted to promote long-time rural credit. European experience can give but little help to solve this question. The oldest form is the landschaft, which is a purely cooperative association of borrowers. Originally the landschaft was a mutual association, in which the borrowers assumed an unlimited mutual liability. A member owning real estate mortgage his lands and was given the amount of his mortgage in landschaft bonds based on the collective value of all the lands of the members of the association. He then sold the landschaft bonds to whatever customer he could find. The association simply issued bonds against a collective security and delivered these bonds to the borrower in exchange for his mortgage, but it gave no assistance to the borrower in either selling the bonds or sustaining their value in the market after the sale. The landschaft was a pure association of borrowers. These bonds, while perfectly sound, were not surplus funds.

whereas the landschaft do not have share capital and do not declare dividends. Both organizations, however, make profits and accumulate surplus funds.

Landschaft associations can loan only on rural real estate within the Province where they are chartered, whereas joint-stock banks loan on both urban and rural property. Both types are in successful operation, and, in our opinion, either type can be successfully operated in different parts of this country with varying degrees of success.

We recommend, however, as best suited to our people, a bank with a foundation share capital limited to loans on agricultural real estate within a circumscribed area. The minimum capital should not be less than $10,000, with compulsory increase, either by accumulation of surplus funds or sale of capital stock in proportion to the increase in the volume of its business.

Cooperative banks: The general spread of cooperation among the farmers of the United States should be fully recognized and every opportunity should be given for the growth of these cooperative principles. In the judgment of the commission, any legislation providing for the establishment of land-mortgage banks should authorize the establishment of force all institutions into one form would probably fail. There should, however, be no differences in the methods of doing business, the only difference being in the form of organization.

Both types of institutions should without doubt be required to have a foundation capital. Even the landschaften have, during the last quarter of a century, found it advantageous to have landschaft banks organized as sister institutions. This follows American practice in business generally, since even farmers' cooperative societies almost uniformly start with at least a small share capital.

The American people are so thoroughly accustomed to the principle of double liability that no attempt could advantageously be made to reduce it. Mortgage banks organized by farmers are likely to be small at first in many parts of the country, and fo while in other banks each share of stock would have one vote; (3) in order to banks, after a small rate of interest had been paid, the results of the paid of the commercial stocks and bonds. Frem English consols have declined from 113 in 1896 to 90 in 1912. Other prominent commercial securities have recorded an even wider range in price. No such variation in price can be found in any series of mortgage bonds which were issued under Government regulation.

Such securities justin merit a wide investment field on account of extending a generous recognition to these bonds, because they are issued to ald and develop agriculture. INTERPRETATION OF LEGISLATION SUGGESTED OR A STATEMENT OF THE CONSIDERATIONS WHICH HAVE LED THE COMMISSION TO SUGGEST THE BILL SUBMITTED HEREWITH.

GENERAL STATEMENT.

As indicated in the discussion contained in this report, the commission was confronted from the beginning with several questions, fundamental in their character and requiring decision before any definite plan could be agreed on.

MORTGAGE CREDIT AND PERSONAL CREDIT.

Foremost among these was the question as to whether any system of banking could properly provide for the needs of both mortgage and personal credit or whether it should be limited to the former. Some of the members of the commission were at first strongly imbued with the idea that both phases of the problem should be combined in any proposed legislation. A bill looking toward this end had been introduced in the Senate by one of the members of the commission, and this bill received the most careful consideration. But, after a more careful and thorough study of the two problems, the commission decided to draft a bill dealing exclusively with mortgage credit, and that the requirements of personal credit could be more suitably met by a separate measure.

The commercial banking system, as outlined in the Federal reserve act, is essentially a system designed to meet short-time credit requirements. Unquestionably, the commercial banking bill recently adopted will largely extend the facilities now afforded for stable condition in banking, for an avoldance of the panics which have heretofore threatened our whole financial structure, and, through the system of rediscounting provided, will provide for an increase or decrease in the volume of our currency to correspond with the requirements of business.

These provisions will benefit the farmer as well as the other great industrial classes of the country; and while it would seem that many of the requirements of the farmer could not be provided for in a pure system of commercial banking, yet it was felt that with the changes in the commercial banking system the needs of the farmers would be partially met, while those not specifically covered in that system could be best dealt with through additional legislation.

CENTRAL BANK V. INDEPENDENT BANKS.

CENTRAL BANK V. INDEPENDENT BANKS.

CENTRAL BANK V. INDEPENDENT BANKS.

A second great question which confronted the commission was the question as to whether it should recommend a central bank, which alone should issue land-bank bonds based on mortgages guaranteed by local institutions and forwarded to the central bank. The arguments in favor of such an institution were elaborately presented and carefully considered. It was urged, with great force, before the commission that a single central bank of issue, having a large capital and alone emitting land-bank bonds, would create a confidence in the investing public which would tend to improve the market for mortgage loans, which would standardize the farm bond as an investment, and which would in many ways redound to the interest of the farmer. The plan of creating a number of small banks, limited in their operations to subdivisions of the State, controlled and operated by local people, paying restricted dividends, and ultimately becoming mutualized, was worked out in detail and carefully considered. The plan of having these institutions guarantee the mortgage loans made in the community and of forwarding them through a State institution owned by these small local institutions (and which, in turn, would guarantee such mortgages) up to a national institution, which alone should issue land-bank bonds, was fully considered. The advantages and disadvantages of such a plan were thought to be worthy of such serious consideration that a bill outlining this method and providing for every detail of the operation of such banks in connection with mortgage credit was drawn up and fully discussed.

But, after a most careful consideration of this suggested plan, the commission was convinced that this was not the best system. Recognizing the public sentiment which seems to exist against a central institution in any banking proposition, and yet feeling that the matter merited the fullest consideration on its merits, the commission gave to it the most careful study. As a result it became convinced that the system

ADVANTAGES OF INDEPENDENT BANKS.

AS against the central bank idea, the bill suggested by the commission affords competitive banking. It is founded on American models. It is based, to a large extent, on the plan of our national banking system, changed as the commission deemed wise to overcome the difficulties which had heretofore been shown to attach to the national banking plan. Under the provisions of this bill any 10 people can organize a separate and independent bank with a minimum capital, with a fixed ratio between that capital and the volume of land-bank bonds which the banks may issue, and with an area of operations as wide as the State in which they are organized. Competition is invited in the organization of such institutions. The right to organize such institutions is given to everyone, and the greatest latitude in operation is afforded that is thought to be consistent with soundness and safety.

The commission recognized that mortgage credit deals of necessity with land; that the laws affecting land are State laws; that there are 48 States in the United States in which the laws governing conveyancing, registration, foreclosure, exemption, taxation, and other subjects relating particularly to land are under State control and differ in various particulars. It recognized that while the Federal Government might exercise supervision over the land-bank bonds issued by banks organized under Federal charter, yet the problem must of necessity be largely controlled by State laws and State requirements. It believed that every latitude should be allowed to enable the incorporators of such a bank to meet these local conditions, provided that a strict Federal supervision over issues of land-bank bonds and over the rules governing such banks which were not affected by specific State laws was adequately provided for. RECOMMEND FEDERAL CHARTERS WITH OPERATIONS LIMITED TO STATE AREA.

In consequence the commission has concluded that, while competitive banking should be encouraged, yet the loans of each bank should be limited to one State. The land-bank bonds issued by such a bank, based on mortgages or deeds of trust upon lands in a single State, where the general provisions regarding conveyancing, registration, fore-closure, taxation, exemption, etc., are the same, would form an ideal kind of investment at home and abroad.

That it would be unwise to extend the area of loan operations of a single bank beyond the confidence of a given State must be apparent. In order to secure the confidence of the investing public, the mortgages or deeds of trust held by the banks issuing them as a security for their land-bank bonds must be governed by the same general laws. It would tend to destroy the confidence of the investor if he should feel that these mortgages were subject in part to the laws of one State and in part to a differing set of laws of a different State. It is obvious that the land-bank bonds of the banks issuing them should be based on mortgages or deeds of trust which are similar, certainly in so far as these fundamentals are concerned.

VARYING INTEREST RATES IN DIFFERENT STATES.

VARYING INTEREST RATES IN DIFFERENT STATES.

The commission also recognized that conditions in the various States are different, that the rates of interest paid for money vary in different localities between large extremes, and that the legislatures of the various States have recognized these varying interest rates by establishing widely varying legal rates of interest on loans. In one State the legal rate will be 6 per cent, while in another State it may be as high as 10 per cent, but the same legal rate exists all over a given State.

In view of this it could hardly be hoped that the land-bank bonds sold by a bank and based on mortgages in a State where the legal rate was 10 per cent could be sold on the same basis as similar bonds issued by a bank against mortgages in a State where the legal rate of interest was 6 per cent. The problem in some of its phases remains, and must remain, a State problem, owing to our dual system of government. Obviously, any attempt to force by Federal legislation one rate of interest in all the States would be futile. The law of demand and supply will control these rates, and legislation which attempted to enforce a single rate all over the country would result in making it difficult to sell land-bank bonds issued in a State where the current interest rates were higher than those attempted to be enforced through such legislation. On the other hand, once the system of national farmland banks is in operation in the various States under Federal law and the bonds are recognized as safe investments, the tendency would be to reach not only a common but a lower level of interest rates.

COMPETITIVE BANKING THE SOLUTION.

A full consideration of these and many other phases of the problem convinced the commission that the proper method of meeting these various conditions was to authorize competitive banking and to permit a given number of men in any State to organize a banking institution, with power to act within that State and subject to Federal control—mainly in the way of supervision and an enforcement of regulations—so as to prevent the misuse of the powers granted. Under the bill proposed any number of banks may be organized in a given State. Each bank can extend its operations over the whole or any part of the State. The amount of land-bank bonds which may be issued by the bank is fixed at a sum not to exceed fifteen times its capital and surplus, so that the maximum ratio between the capital and surplus on the one hand and the outstanding obligations on the other is maintained. Thereby the percentage of reserve held against these obligations, over and above the real estate security, is the same for the small bank as for the large bank, thus enabling the small bank to compete with the large bank in the sale of the land-bank bonds issued by it and based on real estate loans.

INDEPENDENT BANKS SUITED TO AMERICAN EXPERIENCE,

Moreover, the commission became strongly convinced that the individual institution is best suited to the American people, and that the exercise of governmental activities should be largely confined to a rigid supervision, after allowing the widest latitude to individual effort and initiative. Permission to organize separate and distinct institutions with a limitation as to the minimum amount of capital, with a fixed maximum ratio between capital and outstanding land-bank bonds, and with a careful Federal supervision seemed to be better suited to American methods of procedure and to American experience in banking than would a centralized bank which alone should issue and market landbank bonds based on mortgage loans.

THE SYSTEM PROPOSED PROTECTS THE BORROWER, YET ATTRACTS CAPITAL.

THE SYSTEM PROPOSED PROTECTS THE BORROWER, YET ATTRACTS CAPITAL.

The banks provided for under the bill suggested by the commission will attract the investment of capital, because of the adequate and ample returns which that capital can obtain. On the other hand, the borrower is fully protected, because the amount of interest which the bank can charge the borrower is limited to 1 per cent more than the bank pays on its land-bank bonds. The administrative charges of the bank are confined to a given maximum. In these and other ways, the bank is prevented from taking advantage of the borrower and must content itself with a reasonable profit on each individual transaction; while, on the other hand, the volume of the transactions permitted is sufficiently large to provide a reasonable return on the money invested in the bank. The borrower, in case of falling interest rates, has the privilege of paying off his loan, so as to take advantage of such reduced interest charges; and the whole system is designed primarily in the interest of the farmer, and secondarily so as to offer a return on the capital invested, which will justify and bring about the establishment of these banks in all parts of our country and the investment of money in these institutions.

COOPERATIVE INSTITUTIONS ALSO AUTHORIZED.

COOPERATIVE INSTITUTIONS ALSO AUTHORIZED.

While the commission did not believe that the pure Landschaft as originally organized in Germany, or even the modified Landschaft as it now exists in that country, was suited to the conditions and requirements of the American people, it yet recognized the value of cooperative effort and the wisdom of permitting cooperative institutions to be organized. In consequence, provision is made in the bill for the organization of banks on a cooperative basis wherever desired. In such cases the general principles of cooperation become applicable to institutions working under this plan, and they cease to be purely private money-making organizations.

GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL AID UNWISE AND UNNECESSARY.

GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL AID UNWISE AND UNNECESSARY.

In considering the question of the establishment of institutions under Federal charter, naturally the question of Government ald came under discussion. The commission, from the beginning, has been convinced that not only was Government ald unnecessary, but that it would be unwise. The farmers of the country do not desire any special privileges, and the idea of special privilege is, moreover, antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions. Government subvention is not needed. The security of our farms, the value of which is reported to be over $40,000,000,000 and yielding an annual product of the gross value approaching $10,000,000,000, is ample for the creation of a liquid security, which will be readily accepted by investors and which will enable the farmer to use his asset of land as readily as the merchant uses his stock of goods. The farmer needs no special privilege and wants no special privilege, and none should be extended to him.

BUT NO DISCRIMINATION SHOULD BE MADE AGAINST FARM BANKS.

BUT NO DISCRIMINATION SHOULD BE MADE AGAINST FARM BANKS.

BUT NO DISCRIMINATION SHOULD BE MADE AGAINST FARM BANKS. While this is true, the commission believes that it is equally true that there should be no discrimination against the farmer, or against the bond issued on the security of his land. Inasmuch as the basis of our national wealth lies in the farms, the commission has felt that landbank bonds created under this act should be recognized as being of the same class and as entitled to the same standing as the very highest grade of railroad or industrial bonds.

LAND-BANK BONDS A PROPER INVESTMENT FOR SAVINGS.

The greatest accumulations of money in this country are to-day contained in the mutual savings banks, in the great insurance companies, and in our commercial banks. The commission has, therefore, provided that the land-bank bonds, proposed to be issued by the banks organized under this act, should be placed in the same class with the highest grade of railroad and industrial bonds, and should be made available as legal investments for all classes of savings and for insurance reserves.

It has also recognized that these land-bank bonds, based on farm lands at 50 per cent of their value, are essentially an investment for trust funds and for postal savings deposits, and has provided for legalizing their use as an investment for trust funds under the charge of the courts, and for the savings of the people at large, as evidenced by the postal savings deposits. The commission has attempted to place these bonds, when issued under Federal supervision by banks created under a Federal act, in the class of the very best investment securities. It has attempted to encourage their acceptance by the general public and by the average investor, through the plan of having them officially recognized—as they should be—as a legal investment for savings, for insurance reserves, for the money of widows and orphans controlled by the courts, and for all those funds around the investment of which the greatest and most rigid safeguards are thrown.

THE CONTROLLING ARGUMENT IN FAVOR OF FEDERAL INCORPORATION.

And it is just have that one of the greatest advantages of Federal

And it is just here that one of the greatest advantages of Federal incorporation is shown. As heretofore stated, our 48 State sovereign-ties represent a large number of differing methods of conveyancing, registration, foreclosure, taxation, and exemption. The difficulty of securing uniformity of laws in these respects is obvious. The efforts that have heretofore been made to secure uniformity in laws governing negotiable instruments, in divorce laws, and in other directions, have shown that it is at best a slow process, and that, however wise the proposed legislation may be, it is extremely difficult to arouse the people to the necessity of prompt action.

FEDERAL INCORPORATION WILL HASTEN AND ENCOURAGE UNIFORM STATE LEGISLATION—OTHER ADVANTAGES.

EIGERAL INCORPORATION WILL HASTEN AND ENCOURAGE UNIFORM STATE LEGISLATION—OTHER ADVANTAGES.

But, through a Federal incorporation of farm-land banks, it would seem that this problem can be greatly simplified. The bill provides that any 10 persons can organize such a bank in a given State. It authorizes the banks so organized to issue land-bank bonds against mortgages in that State. It gives to every such bank organized the same general powers and makes them subject to the same general restrictions. But it goes further and provides that the supervisory officer of the Federal Government may, by general rules, permit the land-bank bonds issued by such banks to be used (1) as security for the deposit of postal savings funds, or (2) as a legal investment for funds accumulated as time deposits in national banking associations, or (3) as a legal investment for trust funds under the charge of United States courts, or in other ways, provided (1) the laws governing registration, conveyancing, and foreclosure are simplified, or (2) provided exemptions as regards farm mortgages are abolished, or (3) provided such land-bank bonds are made available as legal investments for savings funds, insurance reserves, and trust funds in that State. The object of these provisions is to encourage the passage of laws which will bring about uniformity in State methods of conveyancing, registration, foreclosure, taxation, and exemptions, and which will induce the States themselves to recognize these land-bank bonds as legal investments for savings-bank funds and trust funds under their control, thereby fixing their status as high-class investment securities.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

thereby fixing their status as high-class investment securities.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

Finally the commission has recognized that, in order that the farmer shall get the benefit of the lowest interest rates, these land-bank bonds, as well as the mortgages or deeds of trust held by the banks as security for the same, must be exempted from taxation. It will be conceded that the tax upon a mortgage ultimately comes out of the borrower, either directly or in the shape of an increased interest rate on the loan. The proposed securities are based on land, and land is the one asset which is always taxed and which can not evade taxation. The farmer must pay his proportion of governmental charges, because his land is always there and the assessor can always reach it. The Federal Government has no control over this tax on land and does not attempt to control it. But it is recognized that a tax on the mortgage created by the farmer upon this land or a tax upon the land-bank bond issued by the farmer in the shape of increased interest charges. As an essential to the carrying out of any reform which will meet the farmer's requirements, this species of double taxation must be done away with. Consequently, the bill provides for the exemption from taxation not only of the capital stock of the banks to be so organized, but also of all the mortgages and deeds of trust held by the bank and of all the land-bank bonds issued by the bank against such mortgages and deeds of trust. In exempting the capital of the bank from taxation, the bill follows the Federal reserve act, on the theory that the same privilege in this respect should be extended to agricultural banks as to commercial banks. And in exempting from taxation the mortgages and deeds of trust, and the land-bank bonds issued against the same, the commission has recognized that such a tax is simply an additional charge against the farmer who has already paid the direct tax on his land. It will be impossible to secure money for the farmer on the best terms unless and until

DETAILED REVIEW OF THE BILL.

Section 1 creates a short title, which is essentially descriptive, and which indicates the principal object of the bill.

Section 2 creates a bureau in the Treasury Department for supervising the operations of these banks. The bureau is to be headed by a commissioner of farm-land banks, whose position and duties largely correspond to those of the Comptroller of the Currency in commercial banking. The commissioner of farm-land banks is under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 3 provides for the appointment, the term of office, and the salary of the commissioner of farm-land banks, which in general correspond with the provides for the cath to be taken and the bond to be given by the commissioner of farm-land banks.

Provision is made at the rights of creditors are not appeared to the provision that certain specific powers are given to such farm-land banks, with the provision that certain specific powers shall appertain to each such bank. In these specific powers are outlined the distinguishing characteristics of farm-land banks as distinguished from commercial banks. Among these powers are:

(a) The power to accept deposits only to the extent of 50 per cent of their capital and surplus. The farm-land banks are not Intended to do a commercial banking business. The great volume of commercial banking business is based on the deposits in the commercial banks. Deposits are not a proper basis for mortgage loans, because deposits, being payable within a short time or on demand, are not suitable for investment in bonds maturing from 5 to 35 years from their date.

On the other hand, in making farm loans on mortgages, these banks will undoubtedly frequently have to hold as a deposit the money so loaned. Moreover, in carrying on a business incidental to farm-land banks and are in accord with the general rules governing land banks the commission considered very carefully the question with commercial banks and are in accord with the general rules governing land banks the commission

These provisions are:

(1) That such loans be made for not more than 35 years. In some of the European countries the loans run for a longer term, sometimes as long as 75 years. It is fundamental that the longer the loan at a given rate of interest, the smaller the amortization payment. On the other hand, it was ascertained that in some of the countries where these very long time loans prevail the unwisdom of the course was recognized and efforts were being made to provide for the repayment of the loans within a generation, by attaching to the loans life insurance policies payable on the death of the borrower. The wisdom of extending a large volume of farm loans as a burden upon succeeding generations is at least questionable. The commissioners believed that the American people would not approve of the creation of a large body of farm loans running over two or three generations before maturity. They, moreover, were convinced that the reduction in the amount of amortization payments, in the case of a very long time loan was not sufficiently great to justify the burdening of future generations with such a debt, and that the American people could easily meet their farm mortgages within a period not greater than 35 years on the amortization principle, and that the earnings of the farmers would justify this shorter term. An examination of amortization tables seemed conclusive that the term of 35 years gives ample time for the repayment of these loans at a rate of amortization which the American farmer can readily meet.

(2) That all farm-mortgage loans shall be on first mortgages and that second and third mortgage loans are prohibited. This serves to insure to the investor that the national land-bank bond purchased by him is secured by an absolute first mortgage on farm lands. With this assurance the national land-bank bonds will sell on better terms, with resultant benefit to the borrowing farmer.

(3) Almost any institution can be used for purposes not intended by those who organize it. Every effort, however, should be made to restrict abuses wherever possible. In order that the institutions provided in the bill may not be used successfully by those whose principal purpose is to speculate, certain limitations have been made as to the use of the loans. No farmer interested in the upbuilding of agriculture and the extension of production will desire to negotiate a loan except to complete the purchase price of agricultural lands mortgaged, or to improve and equip his farm in order to extend agricultural production, or in order to refund contratanding mortgages.

The proved farm lands or 40 per cent of other lands, the value to be determined by an appraisal. This proportion was arrived at after a careful conditions. Moreover, the proportions used follow those in reference to loans on farm lands provided in the Federal reserve act.

are credited as each payment falls due, the debt must be wiped out at its maturity.

This section also provides that the land-bank bonds must be refired as the amortization payments are made, and thereby the amount of national land-bank bonds outstanding is always kept at a parity with the mortgages held as security for them.

(3) That the mortgages held as security for national land-bank bonds shall be in the joint possession of the bank and of the special cuch nortgages shall be kept by the bank; and that the register of only be made with the approval of the Federal fluidiary agent. This provision is essential and throws the greatest safeguard around the operations of the bank. A specific Government agent is given joint possession with the bank of the mortgages securing the national land-bank bonds and is given control over the registry of such mortgages. The necessity and widom of this provision are obvious, as this insures the necessary of the provision are obvious, as this insures the necessary of the securities on which the national land-bank bonds are based.

(6) That no national land-bank bond shall be issued against any mortgage running for less than five years. The reasons for this have been fully explained above.

(a) The fourth specific power of the national farm-land bank is the power to use its capital, surplus, and deposits as a revolving fund secure the mortgage and thereafter to issue its national land-bank bonds against the same. This provision gives the bank the working capital with which to conduct its operations. Moreover, the bank is authorized to use this same fund to buy in temporarily its national land-bank bonds, so as to maintain the price of the same.

It is obvious that these national land-bank bonds will undoubtedly deprecate in times of deposits, and as subsequently to sell them again, thereby maintaining the market. This is a most important provision, for unless the market is maintained the bonds will undoubtedly deprecate in times of deposits, and every market to purchase tempor vided.

The commission believes that to a large extent future development of rural banking will proceed along lines of cooperation. We have therefore extended the powers of the proposed national farm-land banks, cooperative, so as to permit these institutions to do a full banking business, under the laws of the United States, exclusively for their own membership. This provision, were it enacted into law, will not confer the advantages of an unlimited Federal charter but it will give great encouragement and opportunity to the development of cooperative business organization among farmers. It is presented by the commission as being the smallest advance which should be granted by the Federal Government at this moment to this new movement in the rural life of our Nation. as being the Government our Nation.

SPECIFIC LIMITATIONS UPON FARM-LAND BANKS.

SPECIFIC LIMITATIONS UPON FARM-LAND BANKS.

There are contained in this bill four specific limitations imposed upovery national farm-land bank. These are more particularly as follows:

(a) The amount of national land-bank bonds that may be issued and outstanding at any one time must not exceed 15 times the capital and accumulated surplus of the bank.

The whole theory of the farm-land bank is based upon a use of its credit rather than of its cash resources. The commercial bank does its business on the basis of its cash resources or of its deposits. It does not use its credit except to a very limited extent. As an illustration, no national banking association is allowed to execute a pure contract of guaranty. But the farm-land bank primarily uses its credit rather than its cash resources, and consequently some limitation must be put upon this use of its credit.

In Europe some of the land banks have been allowed to issue collateral trust bonds to the extent of 20 times their capital and surplus; but the general trend is toward a reduction, and the best thought on the subject seems to indicate that 15 times the capital and surplus will represent a fair amount of collateral trust bonds to be issued by the bank. This means that against the national land-bank bonds issued by the bank there are deposited in the joint custody of the bank and of the Federal fiduciary agent first mortgages on farm lands at not to exceed 50 per cent of their appraised value to an amount equal to the face value of the national land-bank bonds issued, and that the farm-land bank, in addition, holds in the shape of capital or surplus $1 in cash or in quick assets for every $15 of national land-bank bonds outstanding.

(b) The charges of administration imposed upon the borrower shall not exceed an annual charge of 1 per cent upon the amount unpaid on the loan. This limitation is in the interest of the farmer as a borrower. It fixes the charge which can be made by the bank for handling the loan at not exceeding 1 per cent of the loan. This 1 per cent is not 1 per cent of the original loan, but 1 per cent of the amount unpaid on the loan. As heretofore explained, this 1 per cent represents the excess of interest charged the farmer over the rate of interest put by the bank on its national land-bank bonds. It must cover the entire profits of the bank in the transaction, though, of course, the amortization payment for the retirement of the principal of the debt is in addition to this amount.

(c) The periodic payments by the borrower must be sufficient in all cases to pay the interest charge upon the loan, to cover the administration charge of the bank, and to include an amortization payment sufficient to retire and pay off the amount of the principal borrowed at its maturity. If a farm-land bank can sell its 4 per cent national landbank bonds at par, then the farmer wishing to borrow from the bank $1,000 can be charged by the bank the rate paid by it, namely, 4 per cent plus 1 per cent to cover charges of administration and the profits of the bank plus an amount which will be sufficient to retire the loan at maturity. If the loan ran for 30 years, for illustration, the payment of 1 per cent per year or less would be sufficient to pay off the principal within that time, and in the case suggested the farmer by paying $30 every 6 months would be able to pay the interest on the loan and wipe out the loan by the end of the 30 years. Every loan must provide for these three specific items—namely, interest, administration charges, and amortization bayments.

(d) The wisdom of the prov

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

Section 18: In so far as this section refers to the exemption of capital stock and income, it is similar to the provision contained in the Federal reserve act. The necessity for exempting the mortgages and deeds of trust held by the bank as security for its national land-bank bonds and for exempting from taxation these national land-bank bonds themselves has been fully dealt with in the general statement above. Taxes upon mortgages, deeds of trust, and otter evidences of indebtedness secured on real estate mean simply the payment of an increased rate of interest by the borrower, who already is taxed upon his land. It can not be expected that loans for farmers can be obtained on advantageous terms unless and until these evidences of debt are exempted from taxation, for the amount of the tax will unquestionably be evidenced by an increased interest rate, and the farmer who has paid his taxes on his farm must ultimately bear this additional burden unless the collateral is exempt.

FEDERAL FIDUCIARY AGENT.

FEDERAL FIDUCIARY AGENT.

FEDERAL FIDUCIARY AGENT.

Section 19: As heretofore stated, the Federal fiduciary agent provided for in this act constitutes one of the most important methods of Government supervision and control of farm-land banks. This agent is the direct representative of the bureau of farm-land banks. His duties are, first, to certify to each national land-bank bond issued. In this respect he takes the place of the trustee under the railroad mortgage, who certifies to the bonds issued by the railroad, and his signature forms a guaranty to the investors that the bonds are what they purport to be. Second, he has joint possession and control with the bank of the mortgages and deeds of trust deposited to secure the national land-bank bond. By this means the Government assures to the investor that the mortgages held as security for the land-bank bond bought by him can not be destroyed or made away with, because they are in the possession and control of a Government representative. Holding such joint possession and control, no change in the security for the national land-bank bond can be made without his consent in writing. Third, he has supervisory control of the mortgage ledger, in which the statements of the mortgages and deeds of trust are contained. This is necessarily an incidental power to his joint possession decontrol of the mortgages themselves, and is in the interest both of the borrower and the investor, as well as of the stockholder of the bank, whose stock would be liable in case any loss were sustained by the destruction of the mortgages held for the national land-bank bonds.

It is provided that the Federal fiduciary agent shall execute a bond and that his salary and expenses shall be paid by the bank under proper regulations.

CAPITAL STOCK.

Section 20: The shares are placed at $100 each except in the case of cooperative institutions, in which case they may be $25 each. Otherwise this section corresponds to the national banking act.

Sections 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 are exactly similar to corresponding sections in the national banking act and need no special explanation.

Section 26 follows the national banking act, except that the stock ownership of the directorate is placed at 5 shares instead of 10 shares. Sections 27, 28, 29, and 30 are similar to corresponding sections in the national banking act.

Sections 31 and 32 are exactly similar to corresponding sections in the national banking act, and provide for double liability of stock-holders, thereby giving to the national land-bank bonds the security, not only of the mortgages or deeds of trust specifically deposited to secure them, but also the security of the capital stock of the bank, and in addition the double liability of the stockholders.

Section 33 substantially follows the provisions of the corresponding section of the national banking act.

Section 46 provides that a borrower may pay off his indebtedness by presenting to the benk its national land-bank bonds of the same series as those issued against his mortrage.

The farmer who has borrowed $1,000 on mortgage from a national farm-land bank has delivered his mortgage to the bank, and the bank has issued a series of perhaps $100,000 of national land-bank bonds against his mortgage and other mortgages. These national land-bank bonds against his mortgage and other mortgages. These national land-bank bonds against his mortgage and other mortgages. These national land-bank bonds of this series at 95; he purchases these bonds at 98 and presents them to the bank in settlement of his indebtedness at par. Inasmuch as the amount of mortgages held by the bank is of the par value of the amount of national land-bank bonds outstanding, the bank can lose nothing by this transaction, because it receives $1,000 par value of its own land-bank bonds of the same series in payment of a mortgage of $1,000, held as security for those bonds. Upon receiving its national land-bank bonds, it thereupon cancels the same, and likewise cancels and delivers up the $1,000 mortgage of the farmer. This provision encourages the farmer to buy the national land-bank bonds of that bank when they fall below pay, because thereby he can pay off his mortgage at less than its face. Such a provision will tend to maintain the market for the national land-bank bonds of the same, and thereby release a proportionate part of the mortgages securing such issue. This likewise tends to encourage the bank to invest its surplus funds in its own national land-bank bonds, and tends to maintain the market. But all of these cancellations of mortgages securing such issue. This likewise tends to encourage the bank to invest its surplus funds in its own national land-bank bonds and tends to maintain the market. But all of these ca

LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

SEC. 31. That the shareholders of every national farm-land bank shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such bank, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares, unless, in the case of national farm-land banks, cooperative, by a two-thirds vote of the stockholders a larger liability shall be undertaken.

SEC. 32. That persons holding stock as executors, administrators, guardians, or trustees shall not be personally subject to any liabilities as stockholders; but the estates and funds in their hands shall be liable in like manner and to the same extent as the testator, intestate, ward, or person interested in such trust funds would be if living and competent to act and hold the stock in his own name.

CONVERSION OF EXISTING LAND-MORTGAGE COMPANIES AND OTHER STATE INSTITUTIONS INTO NATIONAL FARM-LAND BANKS.

Sec. 33. That any land-mortgage association or corporation, or any similar institution, including building and loan associations or savings and loan associations lending exclusively on farm mortgages, now incorporated under the general or special laws of any State, may become a national farm-land bank under this act, under a suitable name, upon complying with the provisions of this act; and in such case the articles of association and the organization certificate may be executed by a majority of the stockholders of the existing institution, and the certificate shall declare that the owners of two-thirds of the capital stock of the old institution have authorized the directors to make such certificate and to change and convert the institution into a national farm-land bank. The majority of the directors, after executing the articles of association and organization certificate, shall have power to execute all other papers and to do whatever may be required to make its organization perfect and complete as a national farm-land bank. The directors of the old company may continue to be the directors of the national farm-land bank until others are elected or appointed, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter. When the commissioner of farm-land banks has given to such association a certificate under his hand and official seal (after the provisions of this bill have been compiled with), and after it is authorized to commence the business of farm-land banking, the bank shall have the same powers and privileges and shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities, and rules, in all respects, as are prescribed for other banks originally organized as national farm-land banks; but no such bank shall have a less capital than the amount or prescribed for national farm-land banks organ

PRIVILEGES GRANTED TO NATIONAL FARM-LAND BANKS.

Sec. 34. That the national land-bank bonds of any national farmland bank shall be available for the following purposes:

First. As security for the deposit of postal savings funds in such national farm-land banks and all other banks authorized to receive such deposits.

Second. As a legal investment for time deposits of national banking associations, as provided in the Federal reserve act, and for the funds accumulated in savings banks organized and doing business in the District of Columbia.

Third. As a legal investment for trust funds and estates under the charge of or administered by any of the courts of the United States.

Fourth. As a security for loans from national banking associations to national farm-land banks or to individuals, for not exceeding five years, to an amount aggregating not over 25 per cent of the capital and surplus or to one-third of the time deposits of the national banking association making the same, as being within the provisions of section 24 of the Federal reserve act, so as to permit national banking associations to lend to national farm-land banks, on their obligations secured by their national land-bank bonds, in place of making the loan directly on farm lands, as provided for in said section.

The foregoing privileges (or such of them as the commissioner of farm-land banks, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may, by general rules applicable to all banks organized hereunder, from time to time designate) shall apply to national land-bank bonds issued under authority of this act only as and when the following conditions (or such of them as the commissioner of farm-land banks, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time by like general rules designate) are likewise put into effect in any State or States.

(a) That laws decided to be sufficient by the bureau of farm-land banks have been enacted by the Secretary by the secretary of the bureau of farm-land banks have been enacted by the Secretary by the secretary of the bureau of farm-land banks have been enacted by the Secretary by the secretary by the secretary by the secretary of the secretary by the se

(a) That laws decided to be sufficient by the bureau of farm-land banks have been enacted by the State in which such national farm-land bank is operating withdrawing or canceling the right to claim exemption or providing for the waiver of such exemption, whether homestead or otherwise, against the mortgages or deeds of trust (or notes or bonds secured thereby) held as security for the national land-bank bonds of such national farm-land bank: Provided, That if the right to waive such exemption is given, then that all the mortgages or deeds of trust (and bonds or notes secured thereby) deposited as security for such national land-bank bonds contain such waiver.

(b) That in the judgment of the commissioner of farm-land banks the State laws providing for registration of land titles, conveyances, and foreclosures in any given State are such as to give reasonable protection to the holders of first mortgages and first deeds of trust on lands located within that State.

(c) That the national land-bank bonds of all national farm-land banks which are accepted under this law as security in the various matters above set out shall be likewise accepted under the State laws of the State in which such national farm-land bank is operated as a legal investment for the funds of savings banks operating in that State, and of trust funds and estates held by or under the laws of that State, and of trust funds and estates held by or under the laws of that State.

EXAMINATIONS.

EXAMINATIONS.

Sec. 35. That the commissioner of farm-land banks, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as often as shall be deemed necessary or proper, indicate a suitable person or persons to make an examination of the affairs of every national farm-land bank, and shall have power to make a thorough examination into all the affairs of the bank, and in doing so to examine any of the officers and agents thereof on oath, and shall make full and detailed report of the condition of the bank to the commissioner of farm-land banks. The person assigned to the making of such examination of the affairs of any national farm-land bank shall have the power to call together a quorum of the directors of such bank, who shall, under oath, state to such examiner the character and circumstance of such of its business as he may designate. The expense of the examinations herein provided for shall be assessed by the bureau of farm-land banks upon the banks examined in proportion to assets or resources held by such banks upon a date during the year on which such examinations are held, to be established by the bureau of farm-land banks. The provisions of section 26 of the Federal reserve act prohibiting the making of any loan or granting any gratuity to the examiner of a national bank shall apply with equal force to examiners of national farm-land banks, and the penalties and punishments therein provided shall be equally applicable to such examiners of national farm-land banks.

SEC. 36. That the commissioner of farm-land banks shall require statements showing the condition of each bank to be published in a newspaper or newspapers published in the vicinity where the bank is located at such times as calls for such statements may be made by him, and in general conformity with the practice as to call for statements from national banking associations by the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, any or all examinations of national farm-land banks may be made

DIVIDENDS.

Sec. 37. That the directors of each national farm-land bank shall be authorized to declare a dividend upon the outstanding and paid-up capital stock of such an institution out of the net earnings of the same: Provided, That in no case shall any dividend be paid which will impair the capital stock of the said institution, nor shall any dividend be paid which will reduce the amount of capital and surplus of each bank to less than one-fifteenth of the outstanding national land-bank bonds of the said bank: Provided, however, That in the case of cooperative farmland banks the net earnings of such banking corporations available and set aside for the payment of interest and dividends shall be distributed as follows: "To each owner of stock of such corporation may first be paid a dividend in the form of interest upon the par value of the shares of stock owned by such owner of stock, computed at the rate of interest generally prevailing in the community where such bank is located, but not exceeding the legal rate of interest in the State where such banking corporation is situated, if said earnings are sufficient for that purpose; otherwise, to be paid to each owner of such stock pro rata computed upon the par value of such stock. The balance of such act earnings, if any, shall be distributed among the patrons of such banking corporation in proportion to the amount of business transacted with such bank: Provided, however, That in such distribution the share-owning patrons may, if approved by a two-thirds vote, take dividends at a rate twice as great as that paid to nonshare-owning patrons ": Provided further, That a special reserve fund shall be maintained by each national farm-land bank, which special reserve fund shall be created out of the net earnings of the bank and shall at all times be equal to 5 per cent of the total annual interest charge on the land-bank bonds which are outstanding against such bank at the close of the last fiscal year.

That the board of directors of each national farm-land bank shall immediately upon its organization, and before making any loans upon farm lands, appoint an appraisement committee, which shall be composed of three members of the board of directors. The names of said appraisement committee shall be at once delivered to the commissioner of farm-land banks, and any change in the said committee shall be at once communicated to him. The duty of said committee shall be to appraise, or cause to be appraised, and report on the value of real estate offered as security for loans. All reports of the appraisement committee, and shall give a description of the property, the value at which it is appraised by them, the value at which it is appraised by them, the value at which it is appraised by them, the value at which it is appraised by them, the value at which it is appraised by the directors of the bank or by the commissioner of farm-land banks. Such report shall be filed and preserved with other papers relating to such loan, and no loan shall be made on any farm land unless and until such report in writing has been filed with the said bank.

Sec. 41. That the limitation on the amount of deposits which shall be received by national farm-land banks, by which they are prevented from receiving deposits in excess of 50 per cent of their capital and surplus, shall not apply to deposits made with said banks by the Government in the shape of postal savings deposits, or other governmental deposits; nor shall it prevent the said banks from receiving deposits of State funds. On all time deposits of whatever character the national farm-land banks shall maintain a cash-reserve of at least 5 per cent, and on all check deposits shall maintain a reserve of at least 12 per cent, either in cash or in balances with other banks, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner of farm-land banks. The postal savings deposits held by any such bank, except the 5 per cent reserve, may be invested only in first mortgage or first deed of trust loans on farm land, being secured to the Government by the deposit with it of the national land-bank bonds of any national farm-land banks, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, as prescribed in pursuance of the provisions of this act. The funds held on deposit by such banks for the State in which they operate may be invested as provided by the laws of such State.

In such case provisions shall be made in the mortgages or deeds of trust for the payment by the borrower of an amount sufficient to pay the premiums on such insurance policies, in addition to the interest, amortization, and administration charges to be paid by him as herein set out. In appraising property for loans, the buildings and destructible property shall not be valued at more than 20 per cent of the total appraisement.

Mr. FLETCHER. I introduce a bill to provide for the establishment, operation, and supervision of a national farm-land bank system in the United States of America, for the creation of depositaries for postal savings and other public funds, and for other purposes, which is recommended by the commission. I ask that the bill be read and referred, with the report, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The bill (S. 4246) to provide for the establishment, operation, and supervision of a national farm-land bank system in the United States of America, for the creation of depositaries for postal savings and other public funds, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that as many copies as the limit of $500, the amount allowed by law, will furnish of the report and of the bill be printed and placed in the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. And the bill itself.

Mr. FLETCHER. My request includes the bill and the report also, and if granted about 22,000 copies will be printed. There will be a very great demand for the document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. The subject of personal or short-term credit is still under consideration by the commission, and we will, as soon as practicable, submit our report thereon.

The commission concluded that whatever it might recommend respecting a short-term, personal credit plan or system it should be embraced in a separate report and measure.

The report will outline the views of the commission, and, assuming it will be carefully read, I will not discuss the subject further now.

On the 14th day of this month, at the invitation of the National League of Commission Merchants, held in Jacksonville, Fla., I had occasion to make some remarks on this subject, which their stenographer reported, and he afterwards presented me a copy. The speech was made without notes or preparation, and therefore is not as finished a production as I would like, but which touches upon some of the main points in the problem, and seemed to appeal to the convention, composed of very intelligent business men, who immediately adopted resolutions indorsing the idea and purpose of the bill which I have introduced. I am inclined to ask that this speech may be made a part of these remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was diverted for a moment. Do . understand that the speech was delivered outside of the

Mr. FLETCHER. It was delivered by myself at this convention when I discussed these problems. It would save my repeating it here; and I ask that it be made a part of my remarks now, without taking the time of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The speech referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, UNITED STATES SENATOR, DEFORE THE NATIONAL LEAGUE OF COMMISSION MERCHANTS, IN JACKSONVILLE, FLA., JANUARY 14, 1914.

Senator Fletcher. Mr. President and gentlemen, as a Floridian I feel first like expressing my gratification at the splendid attendance from all portions of the country on this convention.

We are always glad to meet the stranger within our gates, and we hope you will enjoy your stay and that we will be able to furnish you a sample of that climate which we believe surpasses any to be found elsewhere on earth. We sometimes tell our friends, by way of illustration of Florida climate, the story of the man who came from the far Northwest to locate in Florida. He was said to have grown tired of having his ears and his nose bitten by the frost and the blood freeze in his veins in the winter, and he came to Florida. After he had been here about 10 years he wrote back to his friends that he was feeling 40 years younger, his health was fine, and he was enjoying life for the first time. When he had been here 20 years he wrote back and said he felt 60 years younger, and so on down, until finally he passed away, suffering from the complaint known as cholera infantum. [Laughter.]

My task this afternoon is not to entertain you, but to talk to you briefly, as I know business men would prefer and as due respect for a bad throat caused by a severe cold will permit, upon a plain, practical, business subject.

I have just heard forcefully presented the objects and purposes and an account of the work of your league. Your league, I know, must be in sympathy with those other people of whom I shall more particularly speak.

I consider that you are absolutely essential to the producer. [Applause.] I consider that the producer is essential to you. While reference was made to the shipper, I take it there would be no shippers if there were no producers. So that linked together must be your league and its work with those who produce the commodities which humanity needs and which are in search of a market. There is no use to produce from our soil beyond what the growers absolutely need for themselves if we can not get the products to the markets. There is no use to produce if the cost of transportation and handling will consume the entire proceeds of the products; so that the welfare and prosperity of all depends upon production and upon economic distribution. The distribution is as important almost as the production.

As I say, I am to speak with reference to some work in connection with those who produce our foodstuffs—the farmers of the country—and the subject assigned to me is that of "Rural credits."

Perhaps it would be worth while to give you briefly an outline of that movement which has spread over this country as well as a large portion of Canada. Nearly three years ago, as president of the Southern Commercial Congress, I had some correspondence with Mr. David Lubin, who is the American delegate, as you might know, to the International Institute of Agriculture, which has its headquarters in Rome, Italy. Mr. Lubin founded that institution, originated the idea, back in 1905. He endeavored to establish it in this country, but he received so little encouragement that he finally went abroad, and there he was able to enlist the King of Italy. The King has erected a magnificent building for its use, and he contributes out of his own funds $60,000 a year toward the work. Fifty-two nations participate in that institute under treaty. We pay our delegate $10,000 a year, and he stays there engaged in that great work. In brief, it sustains to all countries participating—the 52 nations—relations similar to that the respective departments of agriculture sustain to the people of each particular country.

Mr. Lubin wrote me that there was no better work that the Southern Commercial Congress could engage in, in connection with its other activities, than to encourage a movement which would result in providing a workable, practicable, wise system of finance to meet the needs of the agricultural interests of the country. I invited him to attend our convention at Nashville and deliver an address on the subject. He finally said:

If you will get the permission of the State Department granting me leave of absence and will give me one week to speak to representatives from the various States, I will go to Nashville.

• That was a good big undertaking, but I went to the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, who said he would be very glad to give Mr. Lubin leave of absence; that he would like to have him come here and give his views about his observations of the financial plans and systems of certain European countries.

We undertook to assemble as many representatives from as many States as possible, and we had 27 States represented at that conference in Nashville, and Mr. Lubin did give them one solid week covering the various systems in successful operation in those various European countries.

The result was that a resolution was passed putting upon the Southern Commercial Congress the task of raising a commission of two men from each State to go to Europe and to study, on the ground, these systems which have done so much in those countries. It was a tremendous undertaking, and many said we were undertaking something that was impossible of execution, but I said the farmers of the country and the governors of the various States will favor this movement; it is a tremendous thing for this country, and I believe when the country understands it we will raise that great commission.

We were not discouraged. We submitted the proposition to the farmers' unions, and they indorsed it. We took it up with the National Grange men, and they indorsed it. When I say "we," I mean the managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress, Dr. Clarence J. Owens, and myself. We took it up with the national conventions. We got the plank in the platform of the Republican Party indorsing this movement for rural credit. We followed that up with the Progressive Party, and then went to the convention of the Democratic Party at Baltimore, and they wrote it in their platform; and we went to the governors of the various States and laid the matter before them, and we prepared bills for the various legislatures appropriating $1,200 apiece to pay the expenses of delegates to Europe on this great commission. The governors generally favored the idea. Some of the governors had funds out of which they could use this amount for this puropse, and others recommended the appropriation to their legislatures. California, Oregon, Washington, Ohio, and other States passed special laws appropriating funds to carry out the work of this commission.

We kept constantly at it. We had plenty of applications from people who wanted to go on a junketing trip; plenty of people who were willing to pay the expenses out of their own pockets as tourists and pleasure seekers. Those were not the people we were looking for. What we had in view was the actual education of two good, serious-minded, capable men in each State who could come back home and tell the story to the people of those States, and that was the object of having the commission as large as it was.

Senator Newlands introduced in the Senate the joint resolution accrediting this commission to the foreign powers, which was passed by Congress, and the Secretary of State followed it up with letters, and the result was that when they went abroad they were received by the King and Queen of Italy, by the President of France, got a special train through Germany, and by all the countries, 14 of which they visited, were given the highest consideration that any official commission from the United States might expect.

Not only that, but in the agricultural bill went a provision for a Federal commission, to be appointed by the President, composed of seven men; and the language was, in substance, to cooperate with the American commission in the study in European countries of this subject of rural credits and agricultural finance. The President appointed that commission of seven. The commission appointed by the President was organized, and I was elected chairman of that commission and of the American commission, which assembled in New York April 25, although I was not able to go to Europe on account of the tariff and the currency and other matters, but I kept in weekly—almost daily—touch with the commissions and studied their report.

And we have finally prepared a report of the American commission, which we will submit to the various States and organizations directly concerned, and the Federal commission has its report ready to submit, as we are required to do under the law, to Congress. The first part of that report I have here, and, as you will see, it is quite a considerable volume. Following this will be a volume nearly as large, covering the observations of the commission. This gives the actual study on the ground of the operations of the financial systems in 14 European countries; and, as I say, following this will be the observations by the commission, embodying recommendations for the United States. The American commission, cooperating with the Federal commission of seven, has prepared this report, which reviews these various financial systems and seeks to point out wherein they may be adapted to conditions in this country. We can not adopt the systems exactly as they are found in Germany, because our conditions are somewhat different, but we can get many ideas from these systems and from the history and workings of these systems, and we have utilized those ideas in the preparation of a bill which is attached to this report, which is about completed, and which we will shortly submit to Congress.

Before submitting that bill to Congress and before completing our report we thought it best to submit them to the President, because we did not think it would be quite the right thing to have a report and a bill which we would recommend submitted to Congress and referred to a committee and then referred to the various departments before we had the President's views.

We thereupon submitted, just before Congress adjourned, three copies of this report to the President; one he sent to the Secretary of Agriculture, the other to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other he took with him to Pass Christian, Miss. I have his letter in which he said on account of his illness there in Washington he had not been able to examine it and he had taken the papers with him to Mississippi. To-day I am in receipt of a letter saying, in effect, that he had carefully gone over this report and he approved the bill except in two or three minor respects, and he promises to see me shortly in Washington about them. Those suggestions which he submits I am sure the commission will be entirely pleased to accept.

That movement has stirred the country and from the beginning has been kept constantly before the people. We took it up with these various organizations, and upon every stump and upon the huskings in the last election the subject was discussed; and why not? What do we find upon the slightest investigation? I was perfectly astounded when I came to dig into the question. For 50 years we have been operating in this country under a banking and currency system which was purely and solely a commercial system, absolutely created and adapted and used for the business man and the merchant, the manufacturer, and other industries than agriculture. It is not that we are asking anything unusual or anything special for the farmer. I believe that gentleman is pretty well known as being opposed to special privileges, and he is not asking any favor in his own case, but he is asking for a square deal. He is asking to be put upon the same basis as those engaged in other great industries in the country-nothing more, nothing

In that system, which we created and which the United States Government established and which it supervised and controlled, it was written in the body of the law that no loans could be made upon real estate. Real estate was prohibited as security for loans by every national bank established under our financial system.

Now, what does that mean? It meant, of course, that real estate, being the farmer's chief asset, was absolutely condemned as security for loans in this country, and he was deprived of that asset as a basis for credit.

Did you ever think about it? It seems preposterous, when you stop to consider it, that land, real estate, the very basis of all our wealth, was one thing that no bank could loan money on. That was the one most substantial and valuable asset that the farmer had, and we have gone on for 50 years discriminating against the farmer under the only system established in this

What was the effect of that? Naturally, business men, financiers, would hesitate to loan upon real estate, because they said the United States Government will not permit its banks, which it supervises and controls and directs, to loan upon real estate, we better not touch it. Consequently that has been a handicap and a hardship imposed upon the agricultural interests of the country.

The farmer has been, generally speaking, without adequate facilities for financing his operations, and when he had such means he could make them available only on such terms and at such rates as to be the most burdensome imposed upon any people engaged in any industry. [Applause.] And for 50 years,

I say, that has continued.

Not until the recent act of Congress, establishing the Federal reserve system, was it permissible for national banks to loan upon real estate. Not until the recent Federal reserve act could his promissory note running over 90 days be classed as commercial paper available for discount, because he had no goods moving in trade or that he could handle and turn over daily; he had to wait on the seasons. He had his cash coming when the crops matured, and he could not pay anything until then, whereas the merchant is able to carry on his business depositing

Now, I am not blaming the banks in that connection, because the system was such that the banks had to be ready to meet the demands of their depositors on the instant, consequently they could not have their money tied up in long-time notes or loans. This is true under any commercial banking system standing alone.

That was the reason, a very good reason, and it means that system needs to be supplemented by another system under which the farmer can get accommodations to meet his needs, and that problem has been worked out in Germany. It is not a mere theory, it is a practical demonstration. For 30 years they worked on it over there, and for over 50 years it has been established and in successful operation, and we may learn something from the experience of other countries. to do something in order to feed their people. They had to revive agriculture; they had to take care of the farmer because they had to supply the food, and Germany, not as big as the State of Texas, by an area as great as Alabama, is supplying 95 per cent of the food to feed 68,000,000 people. [Applause.]

Here in the United States, this great country of ours, the best country on the face of the earth, we are actually importing beef from Argentina and corn from Buenos Aires. For shame!

What do we find? The tendency is from the country to the cities and towns. We find the tenants increasing and the occuperfectly well that if the farms of this country were idle for one year that the grass and weeds would grow in these streets, and bats and owls would inhabit these buildings? You have got to come back to that, you have got to look after the man out yonder in the woods. We are all dependent upon him.

We should begin, then, at the very basis of his operations because he needs capital, just like every other business man needs capital. Farming is something more than the mere growing of stuff. It is a business, it is an industry; and proper scientific farming to-day requires just as much business capacity, just as much judgment, as any other business to be successfully conducted. It is a business as well as an occupation, as well as an industry.

We heretofore regarded the farmer as not needing to know about business methods and practices, because his business was expected to be attended to by his factor or banker, while he did the plowing and hoeing and hard work in the fields.

It is claimed that it has got so in some parts of the country that as the farmer rears his family-one is a bright boy, and he says of him: "John here is a pretty bright boy; he has a bright mind. I am going to send him off to school and will make a lawyer of him or a doctor. Here is one who has a particular genius for mechanics. I will send him off to school. I will make an engineer of him. Here is Jim, he was always lazy, indolent, and thick-headed and never would learn anything. I will keep him on the farm and make a farmer of him."

Now, that has got to stop. We are going to prosper in this country. We have got to make it worth while to be a farmer. There must be fair remuneration for the toil and the chances. Farming must be placed on a business as well as scientific footing. Country life must be made attractive socially and industrially.

We are not producing the amount of foodstuffs we could produce; we are not taking care of our farms; we are letting them grow up in weeds or waste away; we are not adding to the attractiveness and the beauty and the proper social conditions in the country as we should. If we are to prosper, we are not to neglect these things.

And why should we? There are 12,000,000 engaged in agricultural pursuits. There are 30,000,000 people directly dependent upon the farms for a living, and we are all indirectly dependent upon them. The estimated value of the farm property of this country amounts to $40,000,000,000.

Some people say, "Look here; you do not need to make it easy for the farmer to go into debt. You do not want to assist him in incurring any obligations, for he is too much prone to do that now. We are opposed to that. We do not want any plan whereby mortgages will be put on the farm and sent up to Wall Street." It was charged recently that this scheme was a Wall Street proposition. Of course, the complete answer to that is the stand of the President of the United States, when he indorses the very idea we have been contending for. plan proposed does not encourage but prevents getting in debt.

But our good friends who are so solicitous about the farmer not getting in debt fail to realize that the farmer is already in debt. The farmers of this country owe $6,000,000,000, according to Government statistics, $3,000,000,000 of it secured by mortgages on their farms; and I have on my desk in Washington stacks and stacks of letters from people in every State in this Union, and especially from the Northwest, and in many instances they tell me that the farms are mortgaged up to the assesed valuation of the property; and if it had not been for the natural and actual increase in the value of lands in this country many of our farmers would have been bankrupt years ago. It has been simply the natural rise in the value of lands that has saved them.

Now, that is the condition. There is no use to try to get away from that. On that $3,000,000,000 they are paying an average of 10 per cent, including commissions and expenses-$300,000,000 a year in interest, nothing going to liquidate the principal at all. If we can do nothing more than save the farmers of this country $150,000,000 annually, we will have done something worth while. [Applause.]

But they are paying that 10 per cent on $6,000,000,000, which means $600,000,000 of interest, while here is a possibility of saving $300,000,000 for the farmers of this country every year. Not only that, but it means giving them financial facilities so they can go on with their plans and develop their properties and beautify their homes and improve and make desirable country life. We can do this. It is being done in other countries; for instance, the interest paid in Germany is 3½ to 4½ per cent by farmers. The bonds based upon farm mortgages are sold pying owners decreasing in the country. We find exports of by farmers. The bonds based upon farm mortgages are sold foodstuffs decreasing and imports increasing. Is that a safe in the market at just as high rate as the Government bonds and sound condition for a country to face? Do we not know themselves. Three and one-half to 4½ per cent is the interest at which those people get their money, and the ordinary commercial rate, I am told, is as high there as here.

The farmer finds this condition—and here is where your work comes in, it seems to me-the estimate is that the value of the farm products annually on the farm amount to $9,500,000,000. Assuming that the farmers use one-third of that, we have $6,000,000,000 as the value of the annual product of our farms, on the farms, going to market. It is estimated further that the consumers of this country pay $13,000,000,000 for those products, so that we have $7,000,000,000 disappearing annually between the farm and the breakfast table. Part of it is taken up in transportation; part of it is taken up in distribution; and there, I say, it seems to me, is the problem to which this league could well address its splendid minds—the solving of this as yet unsolved problem of distribution in this country.

What is the best way? The farmer, of course, can not take his product to the consumer. He can not do that to any considerable extent, at least; he can not get in touch with the market places, but he can get in touch with honorable men like yourselves, who can help save him money on his transportation; who can get the best prices for his products; and who can, with him, and with the means you can command, enable some of that $7,000,000,000 a year to go to benefit the consumers of the country, and some to benefit the producers of the country at the same time. [Applause.]

A tremendous amount of money for the farmers, owing $6,000,000,000. We can not comprehend what it is. You may get an idea of it by this illustration: There have been just about one billion minutes since the birth of Christ, so that the farmers of this country now owe $6 for every minute of the Christian era. You must relieve that situation.

And here is what the President says, in his powerful address delivered on the 2d of December, to both Houses of Congress:

delivered on the 2d of December, to both Houses of Congress:

I present to you, in addition, the urgent necessity that special provision be made also for facilitating the credits needed by the farmers of the country. The pending currency bill does the farmers a great service. It puts them upon an equal footing with other business men and masters of enterprise, as it should; and upon its passage they will find then selves quit of many of the difficulties which now hamper them in the field of credit. The farmers, of course, ask and should be given no special privilege, such as extending to them the credit of the Government itself. What they need and should obtain is legislation which will make their own abundant and substantial credit resources available as a foundation for joint, concerted local action in their own behalf in getting the capital they must use. It is to this we should now address ourselves.

It has, singularly enough, come to pass that we have allowed the industry of our farms to lag behind the other activities of the country in its development. I need not stop to tell you how fundamental to the life of the Nation is the production of its food. Our thoughts may ordinarily be concentrated upon the cities and the hives of industry, upon the cries of the crowded market place and the clangor of the factory, but it is from the quiet interspaces of the open valleys and the free hillsides that we draw the sources of life and of prosperity—from the farm and the ranch, from the forest and the mine. Without these every street would be silent, every office deserted, every factory fallen into disrepair. And yet the farmer does not stand upon the same footing with the forester and the miner in the market of credit. He is the servant of the seasons. Nature determines how long he must wait for his crops, and will not be hurried in her processes. He may give his note, but the season of its maturity depends upon the season when his crop matures—lies at the gates of the market where his products are sold. And the security he gives is of a character not known in the broker's office or as familiarly as it might be on the counter of the banker.

nis crop matures—lies at the gates of the market where his products are sold. And the security he gives is of a character not known in the broker's office or as familiarly as it might be on the counter of the banker.

The Agricultural Department of the Government is seeking to assist as never before to make farming an efficient business, of wide cooperative effort, in quick touch with the markets for foodstuffs. The farmers and the Government will henceforth work together as real partners in this field, where we now begin to see our way very clearly and where many intelligent plans are already being put into execution. The Treasury of the United States has, by a timely and well-considered distribution of its deposits, facilitated the moving of the crops in the present senson and prevented the scarcity of available funds too often experienced at such times. But we must not allow ourselves to depend upon extraordinary expedients. We must add the means by which the farmer may make his credit constantly and easily available and command when he will the capital by which to support and expand his business. We lag behind many other great countries of the modern world in attempting to do this. Systems of rural credit have been studied and developed on the other side of the water while we left our farmers to shift for themselves in the ordinary money market. You have but to look about you in any rural district to see the result, the handicap and embarrassment which have been put upon those who produce our food.

Conscious of this backwardness and neglect on our part, the Congress recently authorized the creation of a special commission to study the various systems of rural credit which have been put into operation in Europe, and this commission is already prepared to report. Its report ought to make it easier for us to determine what methods will be best suited to our own farmers. I hope and believe that the committees of the Senate and House will address themselves to this matter with the most fruitful results, and I b

That is the position of the President. Bills have been pre-pared. I submitted one last August, and that was referred to & committee; but I am not so wedded to it that I am not perfectly willing to take any other measure that will bring about this relief. The measure will provide for the establishment of a system of farm-land banks, whereby the farmer can get financial accommodation for productive purposes, on long term, with a low rate of interest and with the privilege of reducing the principal by small payments as he pays his interest. For instance, if he gets a loan at 4% per cent and pays 6% per cent semiannually, he will pay off and discharge the entire debt in 25

Now, gentlemen, I want to appeal to you as intelligent business men, who want to see the country prosper and grow, as it should and as it will, in spite of hampered conditions-do not you favor a proposition like that? If you do, do not you think it is worth while to indorse it by some resolution which would have its weight in Congress? I think it will help if you will favorably consider it.

I am not going to detain you longer. I have in as condensed way as possible endeavored to outline the origin of this movement and the extent and scope of it and to indicate how this great economic question of rural credits ought to be dealt with. The Federal reserve act does not and could not be made to meet the situation. No strictly commercial banking system can. A supplementary system is required. The Federal reserve act goes as far as safety would permit. But under the privilege to loan on farm lands not over $200,000,000 would be available. This amount would be decidedly inadequate to serve the interests of agriculture. The rediscounting privilege is so restricted as to be of somewhat uncertain value and surely is insufficient. A wise system of agricultural credit will undoubtedly be a highly effective instrument of economic and social conservation.

I am going to leave the subject with you with this further thought England might take first place in the naval world, Germany might take first place in the military world, but the United States takes first place in the commercial world. And that is more important than the other two, for the simple reason that peace lasts longer than war. And that nation which is in that position, supreme in its commerce and its trade, is in position, without bullying, to dictate in peace or in war. Its weapon is trade, and it will not likely need any other. That nation which produces a surplus of the prime necessities of life, which other nations must come to it to get or go hungry and naked, is in position of supreme power—and that Nation is the United States. So long as that condition continues her position is assured while civilization endures.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in immediate connection with this matter and as relevant to it, I ask that there be printed in the Record some resolutions adopted by the fifth annual convention of the Federation of Jewish Farmers of America, held in New York City November 16, 1913, and also a little leaflet of three pages, being the third annual report of the Jewish Farmers' Cooperative Credit Unions.

These people have worked out a system of farm credits which they put into actual operation and which I thought, perhaps, might be useful to Senators. I think it would be well for it to go into the Record, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the fifth annual convention of the Federation of Jewish Farmers of America, held in New York City November 16 to 19, 1913.

Whereas agriculture in the United States has long been handicapped because of the lack of adequate rural credit facilities—both land credit and personal credit;
Whereas it has come to be generally recognized that the inauguration of proper systems of both kinds of rural credit will be of inestimable benefit not only to the farmers, who are the producers of our foodstuffs, but also to the urban population, the consumers;
Whereas the land-credit system which was inaugurated by the Baron de Hirsch Fund in 1890 and carried on by it until 1900 and since then by the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society, its subsidiary, has proved to be an incalculable blessing to the Jewish farmers in this country and demonstrated the possibilities of land credit in the United States;
Whereas the system of cooperative credit introduced into the United States by the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society and the 17 agricultural credit unions organized by that society has proved the usefulness and adaptability of this form of credit to American agriculture; and proved the usefulness and adaptability of this form of credit to American agriculture; and

Whereas the President of the United States has in his first annual message directed the attention of Congress to the need of the early enactment of proper laws to deal adequately with the subject: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Federation of Jewish Farmers of America, in convention assembled, most heartily extend our thanks to the President of the United States for his efforts in behalf of the country's agriculture, and that we memorialize the Congress of the United States to give its earliest consideration to this most important question;

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, together with the third annual report of the Jewish Farmers' Cooperative Credit Unions, be forwarded to the President and members of his Cabinet, to all the Members of Congress, and to the governors of all the States in the Union; and be it further Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be tendered to the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society for its many educational activities for the benefit of the Jewish farmers in this country and for pointing to the solution of the pressing problem of rural credit

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE JEWISH FARMERS' COOPERATIVE CREDIT UNIONS.

The Jewish Farmers' Cooperative Credit Unions—the first and, so far, the only cooperative agricultural credit banks on American soll—were created by the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society.

LAND CHEDIT.

This society is an offshoot of the Baron de Hirsch Foundation, which came into existence in 1890. From its very inception the Baron de Hirsch Fund, among its other activities, made loans to Jewish farmers. Ten years later the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Ald Society was incorporated, specially to look after the agricultural end of the Baron de Hirsch Fund work. All agricultural and Industrial Ald Society was incorporated, specially to look after the agricultural end of the Baron de Hirsch Fund work. All agricultural matters were then turned over to the newly organized society. It can therefore be said that the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Ald Society, together with the loans made by its parent organization, has been engaged in the land-credit business close to 24 years. The land-credit system of that society is, accordingly, the oldest extant in the United States.

With the exception of the manner of raising its funds, the land-credit system of the Jewish Agricultural Society is not unlike that of the Credit Foncier and other corporate land-credit institutions of the type prevailing on the European Continent. Loans are secured by real estate mortgage and are repayable by amortization in moderate annual installments. The interest rate is 4 per cent. Although the funds of the Agricultural Aid Society are limited to a stated annual income and its operations are confined to a special class, its work shows the possibilities of land credit and its adaptability to American conditions. In the 14 years the society has been in existence it has granted 2,800 loans, aggregating about $1,800,000. These loans were made to 2,500 Jewish farmers in 31 States and in Canada. The operations of that society thus embrace a much larger territory than those of all the land-credit banks in continental Europe taken together.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT.

The cooperative credit system of that society is a direct outgrowth of its land-credit system. The need of short-time personal credit by the American farmer was long recognized by those at the head of the society. But with a clientele scattered over practically the entire country direct extension of personal credit was not deemed practicable. Accordingly, as early as 1907 serious consideration was given to the question of releving the situation by the adoption of one of the European cooperative systems. But progress was not very rapid. The wealth of literature which is now at everybody's command was wanting then, and it was necessary to go to original sources for information. Legislation on the subject, too, was nonexistent, and it was a question whether such associations could be legally organized. In 1909 the society was prepared to attack the problem definitely, and it was then and there decided to organize these credit unions as unincorporated or voluntary associations. Meanwhile the spirit of cooperation was growing among the Jewish farmers, and the groundwork was being laid for these credit unions through the organization of many local Jewish farmers' associations and their federation into the Federation of Jewish Farmers of America.

PIONEER CREDIT UNIONS.

The first credit union commenced business in May, 1911; 3 were organized that year, 5 in 1912, and 9 in 1913, making a total of 17 in operation. Eight of these are located in New York, 5 in New Jersey, and 4 in Connecticut. Each of them raised $500 or more from the sale of shares to members, and the aid society loaned them each $1,000 with which to begin operations. The form of organization of these credit unions is similar to that of the Raiffeisen banks—after which most cooperative credit institutions the world over are patterned—in so far as that system could be adapted to American conditions and to the peculiar needs of the situation.

The following table contains a report of the operations and financial statement of these credit unions for September 30, 1913. As will be observed, they have an aggregate membership of 517 and a capital of $9,165. They have been in operation for periods averaging a little over 13 months, during which time they loaned out $73,624.66—about eight times their capital. Their net profits amount to $1,317.93; that is at the rate of 132 per cent per annum on their capital.

AMENDMENT TO POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES. I submit an amendment proposing to increase the compensation of rural-delivery carriers by 20 per cent intended to be proposed by me to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R, 11338). I move that the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus-claims bill, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

CONDITIONS IN MINING DISTRICTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senate had under consideration and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor a resolution (S. Res. 243) providing for an inquiry into the strike of the mine workers in the copper-mining district of Michigan. The committee received informally from the Secretary of Labor the results of an investigation and a report by a special agent of the department, and also a report by two mediators who were appointed to investigate the matter

I was directed by the committee to confer with the Department of Labor to see if it were practicable to abbreviate the report, so that we could print it under our $500 allowance by a resolution of the Senate alone. But after conference with the department we reached the conclusion that it would be very difficult to abbreviate the report without leaving out matter which parties interested might feel ought not to have been omitted

I feel that the proper course will be to ask for the adoption of a concurrent resolution for printing the entire document, for it will cover probably 200 pages and will cost more than $500. I think its substance will be very important, both for the use of the Senate and the House in connection even with the consideration of the question of an investigation.

I submit a resolution directing the Secretary of Labor to formally furnish the Senate with a copy of the reports of the inves tigation. I ask for its immediate consideration, although ordinarily, I think, such a resolution should go to the committee. I ask it because the Secretary of Labor has already informally sent the report to us. It is now in the possession of the committee; but before submitting a concurrent resolution to print the report it seems to me it ought to be officially furnished to the Senate

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to ask the Senator if the Department of Labor expects to print it as a departmental document?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They advise me that they have not the funds to print it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I wanted to understand, because if the investigation was made by the department with an understanding that they were to publish it as a departmental document, then, of course, I do not think Congress ought to order it to be printed before ascertaining that they have not a sufficient appropriation for the purpose. But if the committees of Congress request that this be printed for their information and for their consideration I am not going to object. I do not want this to be understood, however, as establishing a precedent for the publication by Congress of something that the Depart-ment of Labor ought itself to publish.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree with the view of the Senator from Utah, and I would not ask that this report be printed in any sense as simply being the work of the Department of Labor and for the use of the Department of Labor. I do so because each House has taken up the question of making for itself an independent investigation of this sub-ject, and because the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate felt that before they determined whether or not an investigation was even necessary they ought, as individuals, and that the Senate also ought, to have the opportunity of see-ing what has already been done. We conferred with the Department of Labor and found that they were not in a position to print it and furnish it to us. The resolution which I shall subsequently submit is intended to publish it solely because the committees of the two Houses need it for their own use.

Mr. SMOOT. The document has not been printed by the de-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has not been, and we did not wish to ask for it if the department could print it; but as we wanted it and felt that we really must have it and could not use it with any effectiveness simply in manuscript—although it was promptly furnished—we felt that it would become necessary for us to take the proper steps to have it formally furnished to the Senate, so that we might have it printed for our own use. When I present the concurrent resolution authorizing it to be printed I shall then emphasize the fact that I only ask it be-Cause we need it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is an effort, Mr. President, on the part of some of the departments to get a great deal of their printing done by Congress that ought to be done by the departments themselves. It is for that reason I called the attention of the Senate to the matter. I fully agree with the Senator from Georgia and have no objection to the plan he suggests being

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 255) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be directed to furnish to the Senate all information he may have resulting from investigations made by the Department of Labor and reports furnished to the Department of Labor with reference to the strikes of workmen in the Michigan copper districts.

FLORIDA EVERGLADES ENGINEERING COMMISSION (S. DOC. 379).

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit the resolution I send to the desk, and, on account of the widespread interest in the subject, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 256) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Florida Everglades Engineering Commission to the board of commissioners of the Everglades drainage district for 1913 be printed as a Senate document, with accompanying illustrations.

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I submit a request for unanimous consent to print, as a Senate document, the last report of the Panama Railroad Co. Heretofore, I understand, such reports have always been printed, but this report was not ordered printed. For use in the debate in the Senate we were unable to get more than a few copies, which, I think, were published by the railroad company itself. Most of us have calls for it, and, as I have said, I think it has always been published as either a House or a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if that document has not been heretofore printed by the railroad company itself rather than by Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. No; as I understand, that is not the case. In endeavoring to obtain copies I have come in contact with a great many officials, and they have told me, in substance, what I have just stated to the Senate, that heretofore the reports have been printed as public documents; but that the last one was not ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Nebraska know how much it will cost to print the report or how large a volume it will make?

Mr. NORRIS. I had a copy of it during the debate here the other day. I have it at my office now, and do not happen to have it here. I would say it would make a document the size of documents usually printed, not exceeding 30 or 40 pages.

Mr. SMOOT. I again ask the Senator who had printed the document heretofore?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Utah refer to the document for which I am making the request?

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the document to which the Senator has been calling attention.

Mr. NORRIS. It has heretofore been printed by the board of directors of the railroad company. Copies of the document can not be obtained, unless from the railroad company, and they only have a limited supply, so far as I know. During the debate here, when a great many Senators were trying to get copies, there were only two copies available, as I have been told by employees of the Senate.

employees of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to see the document.

Mr. NORRIS. The document which I hold in my hand [exhibiting] is not the document. However, the one to which I refer is about the same size as this, but it has not, I think, so many pages as are contained in this one. If it were printed as our documents usually are, it would not make as many pages as the document which I hold in my hand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, submitted by Mr. Lane on the 12th instant and reported, with amendments, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce on the 20th instant, as follows:

Committee on Interstate Commerce on the 20th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to conduct an examination and inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether there exist facts or evidence that in the opinion of the commission would justify the Government in instituting suits or legal proceedings for recovery of fines, penalties, or forfeitures from the United States Steel Corporation, its subsidiaries, or any common carrier because of unlawful rebates, offsets, and preferences received and accepted by the above-named corporation or its constituent companies within the last six years.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to hear all witnesses and testimony in pursuance of this resolution at open public hearings to be held before one or more members of the commission.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby further directed to forthwith subpæna and bring before it William H. Green, of Creighton, Nebr., to give testimony before said commission relative to unlawful rebates, offsets, or preferences received and accepted by the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiary corporations from common carriers as aforesaid.

And should said William H. Green when before the commission name any other person or persons as having knowledge of facts or evidence showing payments of unlawful rebates, offsets, or preferences to said United States Steel Corporation or subsidiary thereof as aforesaid, then the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to forthwith subpæna and examine before it any such person or persons: Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall be construed as affecting the discretion of the commission with respect to the taking of the testimony of any witness or causing such witness to produce books or papers when it appears that such witness is an employee, agent, officer, or director of the United States Steel Corporation, any subsidiary thereof, or of any common carrier.

Report No. 162, to accompany Senate resolution 241, by Mr. NEW-

Report No. 162, to accompany Senate resolution 241, by Mr. New-LANDS:

The Committee on Interstate Commerce reports that it first sought to ascertain whether any investigation was pending covering the subject matter of the resolution (S. Res. 241), presented by the Senator from Oregon (Mr. Lane), and with this view it sought information from the Bureau of Corporations, the Attorney General, and the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Bureau of Corporations reported that its inquiry regarding the United States Steel Corporation had not covered the question of rebates. The assistant to the Attorney General reported that there is a suit now pending for the dissolution of the United States Steel Corporation as an organization in restraint of trade; that the Government has already put in its case, and that the defendant is presenting its testimony; that evidence of rebates would be material evidence in the suit for dissolution, but that none has been presented upon that point; and that if material testimony upon this subject were secured, the Government could probably obtain a reopening of the case for the taking of such testimony.

The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission reported that David H. Lamar had appeared before the commission and proposed to furnish it evidence of rebates and preferences similar to those referred to mploy an attorney whom he (Lamar) would designate, and that the commission had declined this proposal.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane], who introduced the resolution appeared before the committee and stated that the resolution as drawn had been presented to him by William H. Green, of Creighton, Nebr., and that David H. Lamar had accompanied Green to his office; that he himself had no knowledge of the rebates and preferences other than the assurance of Mr. Green that testimony regarding such rebates, etc., would be presented; and he also stated that Mr. Green was unwilling to appear before the committee, but that he would endeavor to secure his attendance if desired.

On a subsequent day the Senator from Oregon secured the attendance of Mr. Green before the committee, but Mr. Green declined to state either what the facts were or the names of the witnesses upon whom he relied, insisting that he desired an open investigation before Commission under the law to prosecute such investigations upon the facts being presented to it, and that he had the privilege of appearing before the commission and presenting his facts and witnesses, he replied that he wished to obtain the backing of the Senate in the matter. Upon being pressed by the committee to give it such a statement of facts as would enable it to form some judgment as to the necessity for and the good faith of the investigation, he again declined to give such information.

The committee therefore reports the resolution back with certain amendments, so that when amended it will read as follows:

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have the Secretary read

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have the Secretary read the amendments contained in the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amend-be referred to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and for such action as shall be deemed advisable by them, or either of them, in the public interest.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Secretary has not read the first amendment, at the commencement of the first page.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 1, it is proposed to insert: Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 241, reading as follows:

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that it is unnecessary to read the entire resolution as amended by the committee. The amendment is in the first two lines and in the last four lines. The amendatory parts are:

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 241, reading as follows

Then comes the resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Lane], and then, after that, the following amendment: be referred to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and for such action as shall be deemed advisable by them, or either of them, in the public interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator just where that amendment comes in in the printed copy of the resolu-tion. Is there a print of the resolution as the committee has amended it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I can get it from that. I had not that copy

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will observe that the amendments are in the first two lines and in the last four lines.

Mr. LANE. Will the Senator state what change is contemplated in the first two lines?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Simply the insertion of the following

Resolved, That Senate resolution No. 241, reading as follows-

Then comes the Senator's resolution, and then comes the other amendment at the close be referred to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and for such action as shall be deemed advisable by them, or either of them, in the public interest.

Mr. President, the first question that was presented to the committee was as to whether such a resolution as that presented by the Senator from Oregon could be passed by the Senate alone; whether it did not require action by joint resolution. It will be observed that the resolution directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to conduct an examination for certain purposes, and also requires that the examination shall be an open examination. It also directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to bring before it a certain witness by the name of Green, and to subpœna before it any witnesses that may be named by Mr. Green.

The interstate-commerce act provides for investigations of this kind by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It does not declare whether they shall be open examinations or not. As a matter of fact, the commission conducts examinations according to its discretion, sometimes conducting them through agents and at other times before the full commission, some of the examinations being with publicity and others without publicity. The interstate-commerce act gives the commission the power to subpæna witnesses. Here is an effort, by a resolution of the Senate only, practically to legislate upon this subject, to compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to subpæna witnesses, and to conduct the examination as an open examination.

If the Senate has the power to compel the Interstate Commerce Commission to subpæna certain witnesses, it can forbid it to subpoena certain witnesses. If it can direct it to hold an open investigation, it can direct it to hold a secret investigation. The mere statement shows that thus, by the action either of the Senate or of the House, individually, if such a resolution as this is to be passed, legislation can be enacted materially varying or modifying the terms of the interstate-commerce act.

Another difficulty was presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and that was the naming of a certain witness, Mr. Green, in the resolution, with a direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the attendance of that witness. Not only that, but the resolution contained a direction to the commission to subpæna any other witnesses whom the witness named might point out.

It was feared, in the first place, that this might result in immunity; that if the Senate had the power to direct this to be done it might result in bringing before the commission certain witnesses whose testimony would give them immunity regarding grave offenses.

The procedure of naming a witness also was unusual. Under the law it is made the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make such investigations. The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission informed the committee that they would be willing and desirous, upon proper cause being shown, to conduct such an investigation. He stated that an approach had been made to the commission by David H. Lamar, known as "the wolf of Wall Street," with a view to an investigation covering this very subject matter, but that Mr. Lamar attached as a condition to the disclosure of the facts which he contended were important facts that the commission should allow him to select and designate the attorney to conduct the investigation.

It appears, therefore, that under the law William H. Green or any other person, without the intervention of Congress or the intervention of the Senate, can go before the Interstate Commerce Commission at any time and secure such an investigation, and that an attempt was made to secure such an investigation, but upon terms which, of course, the Interstate Commerce Commission could not accept.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there any reason why the Senator can not say what those terms were?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The terms were that the applicant should be allowed to name the counsel or attorney who would conduct the inquiry for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator believes, then, that the Interstate Commerce Commission did right in refusing to undertake the investigation under that condition?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Without question.

It also appears that under the law it is the duty of the Attorney General, whenever facts regarding the collection of rebates or preferences by anybody are presented to him, to commence a suit against the offender for three times the amount received. It is therefore entirely within the power of this complainant to appear before the Attorney General at any time, and upon presenting his facts it is made the duty of the Attorney General to institute a suit.

Mr. Green appeared before the committee, after a number of efforts were made to secure his attendance, and declared that he had important information indicating that the United States Steel Corporation had received rebates in a very large amount; that this information was not of his own knowledge, but was derived from others; and he refused to disclose the source of his information or to state facts constituting his information, claiming that he was regulated in this matter by a board of strategy which had control of the situation, and that it was not deemed wise to disclose the facts. In this board of strategy were named Mr. Martin and Mr. Schulteis, of the Anti-Trust League, and David H. Lamar, against the latter of whom there are now pending in New York indictments for the false impersonation of Congressmen.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator is giving considerable notoriety to this man under the name of Lamar, I think it is very well to state, right in that connection, that he is bearing n name to which he is not entitled—an assumed name.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I know the name is a very honored one in Georgia, and I do not wonder that the Senator is jealous of its dignity.

Under all the circumstances, Mr. President, the committee thought the best disposition to make of this resolution was not to report it unfavorably, but to report it with an amendment providing that the resolution should be referred to the Attorney General of the United States and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation, and for such action as should be deemed advisable by them, or either of them, in the public

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I introduced this resolution on the 12th day of this month. My object was to get prompt and speedy action upon it, and the contingency that it might be referred to a committee did not enter my mind at the time. I supposed that I could secure action on it here and have it either adopted or voted down.

It is but fair to myself and to the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to give a brief résumé of the history of the case so far as I know it. But incidentally and before I go further. I should like to direct the attention of the senior Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the committee, to a statement which he has made here to the effect that this man Green stated to the committee that he knew nothing of these facts personally

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is my understanding. Mr. LANE. I understood Mr. Green to correct it afterwards and state that he did know something personally.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That latter statement did not impress me.

If it is a fact, it must be in the record.

I noticed that it did not seem to impress the Mr. LANE. chairman of the committee, and that is what attracted my attention. If he did say it, and it is in evidence—I do not have it here—that fact should be conceded.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator refer me to the statement of Mr. Green on that subject?

Mr. LANE. I do not know where it is to be found. It was in connection with a query propounded, I think, by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend].

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can call the Senator's attention to the matter to which he refers. I have it before me. On page 20 of the report the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsend] said to Mr. Green:

All you know about this is what somebody has told you? Mr. Green. Yes, sir. I did not receive any of these rebates.

Mr. LANE. But, if the Senator will pardon me, there is another place, or there should be another place, in the report in which Mr. Green made the statement that he did know of his knowledge certain facts, but that he had not participated in the rebates. He said he did not have that sort of information, but he did know facts of his own knowledge which would prove his case; and, in addition to that, he did not ask that the commission should subpæna more than five or six witnesses. He also said that the case was not dependent in anywise upon Mr. Lamar or his evidence, and he did not care whether he was called or not; that his advice was merely as to the manner in which the case should be presented. That is my understanding

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a statement in this connection?

Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. On page 26 of the report Mr. Green was asked by a member of the committee as to whether he himself had personal knowledge of the transactions to be investigated. He then stated that he had no such knowledge and did not himself intend to be a witness; that he meant to have others testify. Subsequently during the hearings he did modify that statement and said there were some things as to which he might testify himself. Mr. LANE. Where Where does the Senator find that in the report?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is his first statement.

Mr. LANE. I know what was his first statement; but I ask as to his latter statement.

as to his latter statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not found any other statement than that on page 26. The Senator may proceed, and I will direct his attention to it later, if I find it.

Mr. LANE. There are a great many people of all sorts who come to a Senator's office on one errand or another. One day a gentleman came to my office-two men or three, I think, came I do not remember now what the circumstances were. None of them did I know personally, either by appearance or by name. I think they came back a second time. The question was asked of me whether or not, if certain facts existed, as they alleged they did, to the effect that this large steel corporation had been giving rebates or accepting rebates or had been engaged in that sort or manner of doing business, which is an unfair method of dealing, I would take the matter up and present it and endeavor to see that that method of doing business was stopped. I assured them that I would if it were true. I said if they could give me evidence or bring to me a reputable person who would state to me he knew such to be the fact, so that I might present it in good faith, I would in good faith present it without any hesitancy; and I did so.

When I presented the resolution, that was all I knew about it. A man by the name of Green stated that he knew the facts existed in part and that he could prove the balance by reputable witnesses. He referred to a number of eminent men in his country who knew him personally, and asked me to inquire into what his reputation was. I made inquiry of a number of men, and I found his reputation to be that of an honorable man, a truthful man, and a good citizen. I found, in addition, that some time in the past he had taken an interest in the investigation of the Harvester Trust and had been of use to the Government. I know nothing of the history of the Harvester Trust, except in a general way, nor what procedure was afterwards taken concerning it, but it struck me, if this were true, if those people are practicing this method of doing business, it is wrong, for aught I know it may be criminal, and it should be stopped. I will present it to the Senate, and I am quite sure it will be received there with due respect, and we will take it up and see what can be done in order to put a stop to it. So I brought the matter here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President— The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LANE. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been reading over this resolu-My attention had not been called to it before. I wanted to ask the Senator from Oregon upon what theory he thinks the Senate of the United States can direct the Interstate Commerce Commission or anybody else to inquire into a matter of this kind with a view of determining whether or not legal proceedings ought to be instituted?

In order that the Senator may see the point of my inquiry, I wish to call his attention to this: The Constitution of the United States devolves upon Congress the legislative power. It devolves upon the President the executive power. pressly provides, among the executive duties of the President, that he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. Therefore it is purely an executive duty to see that the laws made by Congress are carried out. If a law of Congress has been violated, as I understand it, it is not the duty of the Senate or the business of the Senate to direct that an investigation shall be had or that a prosecution shall be instituted. That is a duty and a responsibility which belongs wholly to the Executive and does not in any way belong to Congress.

I am at a loss to understand upon what theory the Senate can within its powers direct any officer of the Government or any body constituted by the Government to investigate the subject as to whether or not a particular law has been violated, or to institute proceedings if it has. If the Senator has any information which leads him to suppose that this law has been vio-lated, he has the same right that any citizen has to call it to the attention of those officers who are charged with the duty and responsibility of seeing that the laws shall be executed; but it does occur to me that the Senate has no more business to pass a resolution of this kind than it would have, as a body, to direct an investigation before a grand jury.

I should like to have the Senator's view as to the theory upon which he proceeds in asking that the Senate shall pass a resolution of this character.

Mr. LANE. I will answer that by stating my theory of it. I hold the theory that Congress enacts laws and gives instruction to those of the executive department as to what shall be Then, Congress having passed a law which forbids this method of carrying on business, when for some reason the practice is continued-a criminal one in restraint of trade, an unfair method, a theft, if you please-and the executive officers take no notice of it, and it is brought to the attenion of the law-making body, I thought it would be nothing more than our right, and even an act of courtesy upon our part, to call the attention of the executive department to the fact that such a condition did exist, and to give them the information, and to let them get to work and seek a remedy. Now, what is wrong with that theory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, suppose the Senator had information which led him to believe that a murder had been committed under such circumstances that it would be within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and that no steps were being taken to prosecute the murderer, would the Senator think that the Senate had any right to pass a resolution directing the district attorney or the Attorney General to make inquiry into that matter? In other words, how can a thing of that kind be within the legislative power?

Mr. LANE. It may be that it is not, but that is the theory I hold. When I brought the resolution in here and introduced it the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce immediately asked that it be referred to his committee. He is an older and more experienced legislator than myself. He has been longer a Member of this body than myself, and he is an able attorney. It seems to me that if this was out of order and was not properly in here he would have been saving us a whole lot of time and much trouble if he had first asked the Senate to throw it out. I do not want to bring anything in here which does not properly belong here, nor do I wish in any way to create a situation which will cause any reflection upon any Senator or upon the Senate or upon myself in being connected with it in any of its various proceedings.

This man Lamar, the "Wolf of Wall Street," has been brought into the case. I believed, when my attention was called to it by the committee, that perhaps he was associated with it. I found that he was, that Lamar, the "Wolf of Wall Street," if you please, was connected with this matter. I did not know the "Wolf of Wall Street." It did not seem to me that it made much difference who gave the information if it were true. I do not see now what difference it makes. If there is any man who can go out and wolf Wall Street, he ought to be made welcome to the job. I never knew of any lone wolf attacking a whole pack before—and I have traveled around in the country where there were many wolves. I have slept out at nights-many nights-both in good weather and bad weather, and I have heard them howl all night. I have traveled over the trail with a big gray wolf ranging alongside of it with me. I did not do that without having good protection. I had a 30-30 carbine with me, and was able to take care of myself. I am not so much afraid of a wolf as some seem to be. I do not care anything about wolves or about this wolf. If the man did anything to Wall Street by the wolfing process, as far as I am concerned, he is entirely welcome, for then the wolf has been wolved, as I understand it.

As to this other matter, if these rebates are being given and the people have been defrauded out of hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars by the members of the Steel Trust and there is a gang of criminals who are engaged in wolving the people, it seemed to me important to bring the facts out into the open and have an investigation, fairly and justly to all, and without any prejudice to anyone. If they are not guilty, I do not want to do them any harm; I would not be a party to taking a copper penny away from them-not a copper cent with a hole

I have no animosity against them.

On the other hand, if they are engaged in this practice, and I am assured by others besides Mr. Green that they are and have been for years, and that they have cost this country millions of dollars, it seems to me that as public servants it is our duty to assist any other branch of the Government in getting these facts before them.

It is not a matter with me of securing fines from them for past misdemeanors, although it would be nothing more than right that they should be recovered, and, for that matter, I think it is perfectly proper for the Government to attempt to do it. My sole object, and the only object I have, is to get this matter out in the open and try it on its merit fairly. It is my belief that the condition exists. I am perfectly convinced that Mr. Green has facts within his possession which will prove it, if he is given a hearing. It would take but a few hours for that hearing to be held before the Interstate Commerce Commission and everything would be settled. If he has not the facts, throw him out. I am not asking for immunity for him or anybody else.

You saw an article published in the papers yesterday to the effect that the report of some commission on one of the sub-sidiary companies of this great corporation states that these facts do exist and to the extent of millions of dollars.

I will say that I prefer to have it before the Interstate Commerce Commission rather than have it go to a subcommittee of the Senate for trial or into the legal department of the Government—the Attorney General's Office. I did not wish it sent to the legal department for the reason that there are so many delays, so many quibbles in the method of procedure, that even at this time there is a bill pending in Congress to remedy that condition, which has grown to be well-nigh a curse to this the resolution go straight where I ask it to go, and for the reasons which I have given that it be placed there.

I want to direct attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee and the committee itself have made a report here which does not state all the proceedings of their hearings. chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission I understood was there at the time. Is that right?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; the first day.

Mr. LANE. The chairman of the commission was there the first day, and I was introduced to him. He told the committee very plainly, as I understood him, that this matter was quite within the province of his commission and a matter over which they had jurisdiction, and that they would be glad to hear it and cheerfully hear it if presented by the Senate through the action of this committee.

I myself asked him that question, but that statement does not appear in the report; for some reason or other it is left out.

appear in the report; for some reason or other it is left out. It was important. There is there the reference to Lamar, but not this other one. It was a verification—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. LANE. Just one moment, if you please. That was a verification and indorsement, as it seemed to me, of my position. There was to be but a brief hearing. The Interstate Commerce Commission are willing to take the case and to investigate the commerce commission are willing to take the case and to investigate the commerce commission are willing to take the case and to investigate. Then, why should they not have it, they assenting and being willing to have that course taken?

Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, calling attention to the statement made by the Senator from Oregon that the testimony given by Mr. Clark, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, does not appear in the record, that is accounted for by the fact that informal hearings were had on the first day the committee was in session to consider this resolution, and no stenographer was present. I believe it was upon my suggestion that a stenographer was called to take the testimony that was subsequently heard. The chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission did say, in response to questions asked him by the committee, that the matter had never been called to the attention of the commission, unless and save by the appearance of Mr. Lamar, who offered to submit evidence concerning the matter on condition that he be permitted to control the selection of the attorney to conduct the investigation. He also stated that, if the matter had been called to his attention by Mr. Green or by any one else, it would have been given consideration without any formal resolution on the part of the Senate. As I have said, the explanation as to the testimony of Mr. Clark not appearing in the record is that there was no stenographer present to take the testimony on that day of the witnesses from the Department of Justice.

Mr. LANE. Were there no stenographic notes taken on that day at all?

Mr. ROBINSON. There was no stenographer present, and I myself suggested that a stenographer be called. That was done as to the testimony afterwards taken.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, that accounts—
Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Oregon will give way for a moment, out of order I should like to introduce a joint resolution and move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Rela-

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that that is out of order and can not be done while a Senator is addressing the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair is required to call attention to the rule in such cases.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the attention of the Chair to the rule, which says that the Chair himself must object in a case of this kind. Morning business can not be presented at this time under the rule. The rule reads:

It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a com-mittee, resolution, or bill. It shall be the duty of the Chair to en-force this rule without any point of order hereunder being made by a

Mr. McLEAN. If I am not in order, I withdraw the joint resolution for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is very sorry that he failed to enforce the rule.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not care to delay the proceedings of the

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say that I care nothing about the matter at all. If Senators do not care particularly about the

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] is that upon the first day the country.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] is that upon the first day the the amendment reported by the committee be rejected, and that no stenographic notes taken. I am willing to concede that that is true, but I know nothing about it. Personally I do not know whether or not such notes were taken; I did not see them; but it so happened-incidentally, as it were-that a part of those informal proceedings of which no notes were taken and those which in a manner minimize the presentation of this resolution by me got into the committee's report, and that struck me as being peculiar. If a part of the proceedings, informal or otherwise, are to be published, I do not see why all of them should not be published and let them lie as they fall. This idea of having a most excellent memory for part of the proceedings and a total absence of it for another portion, which to me is important, which I wanted in the report, which substantiates my position and gives me the courage to come before this body and ask for a plain, open, public hearing, is a thing which I do not exactly like. I cut that out, I will say; I do not find it pleasing, and so I withdraw my first remark.

The case has been presented to the Senate, and I make the statement that it has been presented to me on honor by a man who is certified to me by eminent gentlemen, known all over the country as an honorable man, an honest man, one who has been heretofore engaged in this work, who has previously appeared before committees and before the legal department of the Government and not foresworn himself, and it has been presented to me by others who do not know Mr. Green and do not know the "Wolf of Wall Street." They heard of the matter entirely independent of him. The condition exists now.

What is the objection on the part of the Senators of this committee that he be allowed to take the subject to the Inter-state Commerce Commission, present it there, and let the commission have an open hearing upon it? They say they are willing to do it. I do object, and I am going to continue to object, to this proposed dive into the intricacies of the legal department of this Government. It is not from lack of confidence in our Attorney General nor in his assistants. They are involved and tangled in legal wheels. It impedes the business of this country, and has done so to an extent that the people are beginning to lose confidence in it. It has occasioned interminable delay. I want this matter settled promptly, quickly, fairly, and justly to all.

I am going to ask the chairman of the committee if he will consent to strike out that part and let me take this to the Interstate Commerce Commission and present it on merit without prejudice to anybody and without gulle. If this man Green does not "come through" with the information, I do not ask for any immunity for him. I say it is our duty as servants of the people to help the people secure their rights. The "wolf of Wall Street" is not what is harming this country. The passage is not what is harming this country. The passage of tariff acts and of currency acts such as we have passed here are not the measures that are going to relieve the distress of the people of this country. They are palliative, limping efforts forward, yes; but they will fall far short of accomplishing the desired result if the servants of the people of this country, such as Members of this body, do not assist other branches of the Government in their efforts to relieve them from illegitimate graft and the tribute that is being levied upon them.

There is where we will have to strike home in order to pro cure results, and the man who does not care to enter upon such an undertaking or is overparticular in the methods which he pursues as to the details of his procedure and walks through his job with mincing feet is not doing his duty by the country. am asking the Senate, in good faith, to allow me, free of the "Wolf of Wall Street," without his evidence or his influence—if he does any good, I am willing to give him credit for it; I have nothing against the man and know nothing about himpresent this case to the Interstate Commerce Commission. ask the Senator from Nevada if he will consent to striking out the amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have to say that the action presented by this report is the action of the committee, and it would be entirely without my power to grant the Sena-tor's request. Besides that, I have to say that my judgment would be against granting it. The amendment which the Sen-ate committee has reported refers this entire resolution to both the Attorney General and the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and for such action as may be deemed advisable in the public interest. We have confidence, and the Senator undoubtedly has confidence, in both the Attorney General and the Interstate Commerce Commission. He and the gentlemen whose names he presents here can easily appear before both or either of them after this resolution is referred to them; they will undoubtedly get a full hearing, and the Senator's purpose will be accomplished.

I am aware of the fact that very valuable information often comes from questionable sources, and I do not propose on that ground to condemn any information. I have not the slightest idea of doing that. I want to further the purpose of the Sena-tor in getting all the facts before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has the power to investigate them, and before the Attorney General, who has the power to bring suit and whose duty it is, if probable cause is shown, to institute a suit. The Senate committee has acted entirely in furtherance of public justice on this subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest that if the resolution which has been reported by the committee is passed by the Senate without amendment, at least, as I understand the parliamentary situation, it would not necessarily require an investigation as contemplated by the resolution itself. It would not be equivalent to the passage of the resolution.
Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we should pass without amendment the resolution as reported and the Interstate Commerce Commission should investigate the matter a little, report it back to the Senate, and recommend that the resolution be passed; then if we passed the resolution it would go back to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they would take the evidence. If the committee have sufficient information to cause them to believe that there is reasonable ground to think that these charges will be sustained, why is it not better to pass the resolution itself instead of referring the resolution to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

The Senate has referred the resolution to the committee, and the committee has reported it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it be referred to another body. Then, if we ommendation that it be referred to another body. Then, if we refer it to that other body, they will refer it back again. It strikes me that it is the duty of the committee to ascertain—and that was the purpose in referring it to the committee whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant an investigation, and, if so, for the committee to recommend it, and then we could pass the resolution, either as it was introduced or with such amendments as might be necessary to have the investigation take place.

Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. President. I have to say that the committee has no information upon which to base any action. On the contrary, Mr. Green expressly refused to give the committee any information, and no information whatever was given to the committee by anyone upon which it could form a judgment as to the importance or the necessity of this resolution. On the contrary, the parties who appeared before the committee declared that they did not desire to give the committee the facts, and demanded of the committee that the resolution be passed without information.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that. Mr. NEWLANDS. It seems to me that the committee, under all the circumstances, has acted in a very tolerant way in reference to this resolution-

Mr. NORRIS. I am not disputing that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And they did so out of regard to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], for whom they have the highest respect and whose motives in this matter they do not for a moment doubt. They have no doubt that he is actuated by the most worthy motives. So they thought that the best way was to amend this resolution so as to refer it both to the Attorney General and to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation and for such action as they deemed advisable in the public interest. What could that action be? If these witnesses give them the testimony which they refused to give to our committee and put them in the possession of the facts, and the facts warrant it, doubtless the Attorney General will immediately commence the suit which they desire to have instituted. f the facts are presented to him and they require legal action, failure to bring such a suit would constitute an impeachable So also with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission. If they were simply put upon the trail of the facts, which would be likely to indicate a receipt of rebates and preferences in violation of the law, it would be their duty under he law to investigate this matter.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator

Mr. NEWLANDS. I merely want to add a word. It would be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to go on with the inquiry. What right have we, as only one branch of the legislative body, to determine the method of investigation by that commission when the law prescribes it? What right has the Senate, acting alone, to determine whether their meetings shall be open or secret, when it is their privilege under the law to determine that question? If the Senator wishes to change the law, let an act of Congress be passed providing that all the sessions of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be open; and when that law passes both Houses of Congress and is signed by the President then it will be operative; but the Senate alone is called upon by him to change and modify the law and to create a new law with reference to investigations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LANE. I yield. Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I think, misapprehends the suggestion I have made, because I have not intimated that the committee should be criticized for its action or that it did not act with the proper respect toward its action or that it did not act with the proper respect toward the Senator from Oregon. I have not suggested anything of that kind; but the idea that struck me was this: The committee say, "We know nothing about the matter; we can not find out anything about it, and we will refer it to the Interstate Commerce Commission." The commission will not investigate under a reference like that. If we pass the resolution as amended, it would not be their duty, and we could not expect them, to conduct the investigation. If this resolution should be passed, the only question which would be before the Interstate Commerce Commission would be, Ought this resolution to be passed by the Senate; ought it to be amended and, as amended, pass, or by the Senate; ought it to be amended and, as amended, pass, or what action should the Senate take? They will refer it back with their conclusions, and then perhaps it will be passed if they recommend that it shall be passed, and then the Interstate Commerce Commission could undertake a full investigation.
Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Sen-
